Post Office Act (VI of 1898)—

——Ss. 6 and 34—Non-tracing sender or addressee is not loss or mis-delivery 692

Practice—

——Appeal—Judgment of lower Court containing unnecessary passage—Only way of interference is to order expunging it 724

——Court's object is to decide parties' rights and is not to punish them for mistakes in procedure by deciding against their rights 818

*——English law—Applicability of.—It is sometimes dangerous to try to ascertain Indian law by discussing English cases. But where, in legislation like the U. P. Municipalities Act, following closely upon English Local Government legislation, the legislature has left the matter at large, without following it up by codifying the general law on a topic such as highways, Indian Courts must apply English principles—Precedent—English cases 599

*——Inconsistent claims do not justify dismissal such as claims of ownership and of easement 97

——Inconsistent plea — Order setting aside ex parte decree can't be challenged in appeal from decree in suit 929

Practice—

——Judgment—Ambiguity in judgment of lower Court is a good ground for attacking it but ambiguity may be explained 729

*——Judgment — Erroneous statement by counsel or misunderstanding by a Judge can be corrected only by a review and not by appeal 518 ——Judgment — Second appeal — Facts stated by counsel cannot be ordinarily challenged by the party at later stages 518

——Misguidance by Judicial Officer vitiates proceedings 818

*——Pleadings — Inconsistent findings against co-defendants cannot be given 150

——Pleas—Particulars of claim and defence should be insisted on to expedite justice 17 ——Points of law with regard to admissibility and legal effect of evidence will not as general rule be entertained in second appeal if they have not been taken at least in first appeal 709

Precedent—

——Authority.—A case is an authority only for what it decided and is no authority for what may seem to follow from the reasonings adopted in the case 897

——Distinguishing — If a case is distinguished it is unnecessary to express any opinion as to its correctness.— It is notorious that cases are sometimes distinguished on very slender grounds to avoid the responsibility of appearing to overrule them 851

Pre-emption—

——A person purchasing a plot of land situated within a share in a village is a co-sharer in the village though his name did not appear in the revenue papers 305

——The fact that wajib-ul-arz contains many provisions relating to matters of contract does not prevent its being treated also as a record of custom 274

——In the U.P. there are two kinds of custom of pre-emption:— (1) Where it can be claimed even on sale to one of the co-sharers, by a co-sharer of a nearer class;

Pre-emption—

(2) Where it can be claimed by the co-sharers in a certain order of priority in case of sale to stranger 753

——The existence of common khata as joint property of all co-sharers does not render a person belonging in other respects to one category, joint co-sharer with another belonging to a different category as regards separate interest sold by latter person 753

——There is no difference in principle between clause in wajib-ul-arz prescribing order of persons to whom vendor is to offer property and clause giving order of classes entitled to pre-empt in case of sale 753

*——Basis—Right must rest in contract, custom or statute--Custom can be deduced from decisions—Variation in rule deduced from previous judgments is not permissible 318

——Burden of proof is on plaintiff to establish not a general custom but a particular one entitling him to decree against defendant vendee 753

——By contract — Plaintiffs not parties to it—They cannot enforce 449

——Custom of --A custom of pre-emption of which there is prima facie evidence in the entry in the wajib-ul-arz is not necessarily negatived by three instances of sales to strangers 791

——Custom of, is not abrogated by partition of a village nor by its becoming incapable of being applied in full to altered conditions effected by partition 603

——Custom—A mere resident can pre-empt if wajib-ul-arz so provides 86

——Custom —Gorakhpur District—About the Zamima Khewhat of 1885 of Gorakhpur it must be assumed that the proprietors must be other than Mahomedans and expressly desired to have the custom of pre-emption recorded and must have adduced proof before the Settlement Officer, conclusive to show that the custom existed 424

——Custom in Kumaun—Sharer in laga village cannot pre-empt sale in asl village 318

——Custom lapses if property vests in one individual only 371

Pre-emption—

——Custom—Mahomedan Law.—In absence of inconsistent particulars right of pre-emption is according to Mahomedan Law 523

——Custom—Sales are not necessary to establish custom 523

——Custom of—Wajib-ul-arz.--A custom of pre-emption is negatived by entry in wajib-ul-arz showing that all co-sharers agreed that there would, since the time of such agreement, be no custom of pre-emption in vogue 793

——Custom — Wajib-ul-arz — The presumption raised by the entry in a wajib-ul-arz is not rebutted by the circumstances that more than 100 years ago the villages were owned by a single proprietor 859

——Events subsequent to first Court's decree cannot be considered 448

——Evidence should not be ambiguous 753

——Exchange—Exchange is not sale and consequently where sale alone gives the right of pre-emption there is no such right in case of exchange 390

——Hissedar karibi — Meaning depends upon context 456

——Incidents of—A claim to a right of pre-emption does not necessarily connote a suit; it may be enforced either by private treaty or by suit. It implies an assertion of a right which may be asserted before a transfer is effected or after it is effected. The right arises from a sale if the order of preference laid down by the wajib-ul-arz is disregarded by the vendor 753

*——Perpetual lease — Premium, almost equal to value, and small rent do not constitute sale 60

*——Right by contract continues against representatives and assigns with notice 657

*——Right to sue—Right to pre-empt must exist on date of sale, date of suit, and date of first Court's decree 82

——Subject-matter—A mere option of re-purchase cannot be pre-empted 743

——Subject-matter—The interest of an owner in sir plots is a proprietary interest and the transfer of the sir plots is in fact a transfer of his proprietary interest 447

Pre-emption—

*——Suit for—Strangers being joined in respect of a portion of the property claim in respect of whole fails 81

——Wajib-ul-arz is good evidence unless otherwise rebutted 52

——Wajib-ul-arz—Absence of actual transfer in accordance with custom recorded in wajib-ul-arz in a pre-emption does not rebut presumption raised by wajib-ul-arz 723

——Wajib-ul-arz — An ambiguous wajib-ul-arz is insufficient to prove the custom of pre-emption which plaintiff is bound to prove in a suit for pre-emption 541

——Wajib-ul-arz — Custom — Presumption of a custom raised by 1882 wajib-ul-arz is not rebutted by entry of a sole proprietor in 1840 146

——Wajib-ul-arz on construction preference was held to exist among co-sharers inter se 227

——Wajib-ul-arz.—Owing to special instructions given to settlement officers in the wajib-ul-arzes of 1885 in Basti and Gorakhpur Districts the record of custom of pre-emption raises a very strong presumption 371

——Wajib-ul-arz—Wajib-ul-arz prepared at partition does not abrogate old customs 425

——Wajib-ul-arz.—The mere fact that the wajib-ul-arz records a right of pre-emption in favour of owners of contiguous villages does not by itself render the wajib-ul-arz useless as evidence of custom 925

——Wajib-ul-arz—Where a wajib-ul-arz contained a clause, in matters recording rights of pre-emption, to the effect that if a stranger has inherited property from an issueless co-sharer he would not be entitled to the right of pre-emption, the existence of the right of pre-emption was held to be a matter of contract and not of custom 542

——Wajib-ul-arz—Where the wajib-ul-arz of 1884 gives a right of pre-emption to Zamindars but that of 1863 does not show such right, the presumption created by the wajib-ul-arz of 1884 is destroyed by that of 1863 925

——Who can pre-empt—Hissadar Karibi.—A co-sharer by belonging to the same Hindu family as the vendor and by becoming member of the family by marriage is a Hissadar Karibi 534

——Who can pre-empt—Mohtamims have a kind of proprietary interest and are entitled to pre-emption 735

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT

✱ 1924 ALLAHABAD 1

WALSH, J.

[ON DIFFERENCE BETWEEN LINDSAY AND DANIELS, JJ.]

Abdul Wahid Khan—Applicant.

Abdullah Khan—Opposite Party.

Criminal Ref. No. 159 of 1923, D/-21st May 1923 from the order on reference by the S. J., Azamgarh D/-7th March, 1923.

Criminal P. C., S. 133—Civil dispute involved—Magistrate has jurisdiction to refuse to interfere—Public way—Dedication to public must be proved.

S. 133 is quite plain. The Magistrate must deal with an alleged "public" way even though it is disputed. These summary powers were primarily intended to be exercised in cases where there was no question that the way was one vested in the public, and when that question is seriously disputed, and its decision becomes a difficult matter of mixed fact and law, a Magistrate clearly has jurisdiction to exercise his discretion by declining to decide it, and sending the parties to a Civil Court. 28 All. 98, diss. 1932 Cal. 59=49 Cal. 683 F. B., Ref.

Private property cannot be converted into public merely because it looks as though it ought to be and because to do so would be convenient to a section of the public who have enjoyed permissible user over it. [P. 7 C. 1]

M. J. Banerjee and Iqbal Ahmed—for Applicant.

P. L. Banerjee—for Opposite Party.

Lindsay, J.—[29-3-1923]. The facts which have led up to this reference are set out in the order of my learned colleague and I need not repeat them.

The recommendation of the Sessions Judge is based upon two grounds. 1. that the magistrate should have stayed his hand and should have referred the parties to the civil Court when he found that a bona fide and substantial dispute as to title had been raised between the parties; and 2. that on the merits the order of the magistrate was not a proper order inasmuch as it had not been proved that the way in question was a public way. As to the first of these grounds we are both agreed that the magistrate's order cannot be discharged because he failed to send the parties to the civil Court. The ruling in Emperor v. Dost Muhammad (1) cannot be accepted as a correct exposition of the law.

On the merits, however, I am of opinion that the magistrate's order is not proper and I would therefore accept the recommendation of the learned Sessions Judge.

With regard to the argument that this is not a case for the exercise of our revisional jurisdiction all I desire to say is that the discretion we have to interfere ought to be exercised in all cases where an attempt is made to abuse the process of the Court so as to prevent parties from resorting to the criminal Courts to compel a decision regarding matters which properly lie within the cognizance of the civil Courts.

The present case constitutes to my mind an attempt of this nature and I therefore feel at liberty to scrutinise the evidence so as to ascertain whether the complainant has proved that the way in question is a public way.

We are not concerned here with any road made under statutory powers or vested in any public or local authority. We are dealing with an unmetalled path or track which skirts two sides of a village situated in the environs of the town of Azamgarh. The parties to the case are co-sharers in the village whose shares have been divided by partition. Their houses are adjacent and abut on the disputed way. In order to show that this way is a public way it must be proved that it has been dedicated to the public generally. A dedication to a limited section of the public is void and of no avail.

Such general dedication has to be inferred from the conduct of the owners of the soil and from uninterrupted user of the way by the general public.

So far as the conduct of the owners is concerned we have the admitted fact that when partition of the village was carried out the soil over which this way passes was divided between the co-sharers without any reservation of a right of passage for the public. The complainant himself was allotted one of the portions of this land (plot No. 320) and it is difficult in the circumstances to see how he can be heard to say that he has dedicated a right of passage to the general public. Nor indeed did he make any such allegation in the complaint which he lodged in the magistrate's Court. In this he described the way as follows :—

"A kachcha road by which all the tenants (riaya) and we ourselves (meaning, I presume, the Zamindars) have always been passing on foot or mounted and which is used for passing to and from by the parda ladies (masturat) belonging to families which live in that quarter."

That in my opinion is not a description of a road used by the public, but of one which is used by the tenants and residents of the village.

In his deposition before the Court the complainant improved on this description and said the road had been used by the public for 30 or 35 years. In answer to the Court he spoke of it as being used by people of the town and people from outside when they came to visit him at his house.

The oral evidence in the case is in my opinion vague and unconvincing and does not establish user of this road by the general public. Some of the evidence is clearly that of partisan witnesses and may be disregarded.

The patwari who speaks of the way being public has been in that office for only four or five years though he speaks of having known the locality for a longer period. He admits that in the settlement record the land is recorded as fallow or waste land (banjar) and that there is no village map or record showing the existence of a public right of way.

I place no reliance on the testimony of the two tenants Naresh and Sadaphal.

Then there is the evidence of Roshan Khan a veterinary surgeon who has been in practice in Azamgarh for 11 years. This evidence is very contious and the sum and substance of it is that he uses the road when he goes to visit the "Babus" (i. e. the zamindars). He speaks of it as being the main way to go to the complainant's house. He also speaks of visiting the house of one Muhammad Idris and using this road for the purpose. We are told that this gentleman is or was a Deputy Collector who occupied a house in the village.

The last witness is the Secretary to the Municipality, who says he has visited Sidhari and driven over the road in an ekka or four-wheeled carriage. His cross-examination suggests that he has little occasion to visit the village and that he only goes there to visit the Babus (i. e. the zamindars)

Such is the evidence produced for the complainant. The evidence for the opposite party is of little value with the exception of that of a partition amin, who carried out the partition of the village. He had before him at the time of giving his evidence the partition map and record and he proves that the land in dispute (No. 320) was divided among the co-sharers as banjar and that there was no record of its being used as a public way. He states definitely that there were only two roads (rastas) viz Nos: 79 and 152. He speaks of a path existing over No, 320 but he does not speak of that being treated by the parties as a public path.

On this review of the evidence I am definitely of opinion that there was no reliable proof before the magistrate that any public right of way had arisen over the land in question by dedication to the general public. Indeed the magistrate seems to have had doubts in the matter to judge from the following native remark which occurs in his judgment. Dealing with the fact that the land (No. 320) was recorded as banjar at the time of partition he says :—

"This may be no wonder as every one might have thought of utilising his share of the village paths in other ways when opportunity arose so they were better shown as banjar lands."

It appears to me that the fact that there is no record in the settlement or village papers of any public right of way over this land and the further fact that the land was dealt with at partition in a manner quite inconsistent with the existence of any such right definitely refute the case put forward on behalf of the complainant and dispose of the evidence which was led in support of it.

We have here no case of a complaint made by one of the general public alleging the violation of a public right of way. The complainant is a zamindar: the opposite party is also a co-sharer in the village and the complainant's neighbour, and everything about the case suggests the conclusion that what was brought before the Court was nothing more than a squabble about a private right of way. Disputes of this nature are not to be decided in the criminal Courts.

For the above reasons I hold that the Session's Judge's recommendation should be accepted and the order of the magistrate discharged.

Daniels, J.—This is a reference by the learned Sessions Judge of Azamgarh on an application by Abdul Wahid Khan asking this Court to set aside in revision an order passed against the applicant under S. 137 Cr. P. C. The order relates to an alleged kutcha road in the village of Sidhari close to Azamgarh connecting the Muhammadabad and the Ghazipur roads and passing close to the houses of the parties.

On a conditional order being made against the applicant under S. 133 Cr. P. C. he appeared to show cause against it and pleaded:

Firstly, that the drain in question was fifteen or sixteen years old and did not cause any inconvenience to anybody, and secondly, that the portion of the alleged road over which it had been built was his private property (it was undoubtedly assigned to him at a partition in 1912) and that there was no public right of way over it. The learned Sessions Judge was of opinion that the moment a bona fide dispute as to title was raised by the defendant the jurisdiction of the Magistrate was ousted and the Magistrate was bound to stop the proceedings and to refer the parties to a civil suit. That view is supported by a ruling of a Judge of this Court in Emperor v. Dost Muhammad, (1). That ruling has recently been dissented from by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Ram Sagar Mandal v. Alek Naskar (2) and in our opinion it is incorrect. No such limitation on the jurisdiction of the Magistrate is to be found in the language of the Code. On objection being taken by the defendant under S. 135 (b) the Magistrate was entitled to decide, whether his conditional order was reasonable and proper or not, that is to say, he had to decide whether the defendant had unlawfully obstructed a way which is or may be lawfully used by the public.

Although he considered that the learned Magistrate had no jurisdiction to decide the point the learned Sessions Judge went on to consider the case on the merits, and has held that the Magistrate came to a wrong conclusion on the evidence and that there was no public right of way over the land in dispute. The principles by which this Court is guided in cases of revision are well established and it would not be necessary to refer to them but they have been to some extent questioned in the course of the argument. A High Court undoubtedly has jurisdiction to entertain a revision on grounds of fact, but it is equally well established that this power should be very sparingly exercised. There is a well-marked distinction between an application in revision and an appeal. It would be futile for the legislature to grant the right of appeal in some cases and to withhold it in others if the High Court, under the guise of a revision were to allow conclusions of fact based on evidence to be canvassed and attacked on the footing of an appeal. Broadly speaking, the rule is that the High Court will only entertain a revision on facts where either there is no evidence to support the finding or where the finding arrived at is perverse or such as no reasonable man could have arrived at on the evidence produced. The case law on the subject is collected in Sohoni's Criminal Procedure Code, but the gist of the matter was admirably put by Piggott, J. in Ahsan Ullah Khan v. Mansukh Ram (3) at page 405:

"The revisional jurisdiction of this Court can always be exercised in order to prevent a gross and palpable failure of justice. At the same time it should not be so exercised as to make one portion of the Code of Criminal Procedure conflict with another, as would be the case were this Court to permit the practice to grow up of invoking its interference in revision so as to give a right of appeal where such right is definitely excluded by other provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure."

In this respect there is no difference between a reference and a revision. A person invoking the revisional jurisdiction of the Court is bound according to the practice of the Court to apply first to the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate. If the latter considers that a case for revision is made out he reports the matter to the High Court under S. 438 Criminal Procedure Code with a view to the High Court exercising its revisional powers under S. 439. If the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate considers that the application should not be entertained he rejects it leaving the aggrieved party to apply to the High Court direct. S. 439 makes no distinction between the two cases.

The Magistrate has used in the course of his order some loose expressions which are criticised by the learned Sessions Judge, but his substantial finding is that "It cannot but be concluded that these banjar portions of No. 320 (the plot in dispute) were recorded all through as public passages and not private and reserved." Naturally a village by-road of this kind would only be used by persons living in the village or by persons having occasion to visit the village, but the Magistrate does distinctly find that there is a public right of way over the road in question which has been obstructed by the defendant. The defendant's plea that the drain had been in existence for twelve or fifteen years has been found to be, and undoubtedly was, false. The parties who are next door neighbours and near relations, have fallen out, and the drain has been recently dug for the express purpose of blocking the right of way which previously existed. The oral evidence strongly supports the conclusion at which the Magistrate has arrived. Apart from the complainant himself and witness Sadaphal Singh who may be attacked as having had some litigation with the defendant's mother, who state respectively that the road in question is used by people carrying dead bodies to the burning ghat and by ekkas, tumtums and carts, the complainant has called the patwari of the village, the secretary of the Municipal Board, and a veterinary assistant. The patwari distinctly deposes that the road is a public way used by people generally and by ekkas and carriages and that he has seen it so used during the last thirty or thirty-five years.

The Secretary of the Municipal Board describes it as a kutcha road connecting the Ghazipur and the Muhammadabad pucka roads, and states that he has often passed over it in an ekka or hackney carriage either to go to the house of the complainant or the house of another man named Abdul Aziz Khan, these being the only houses in the village which he happens to have occasion to visit. This witness is a man of position who is not likely to have given false evidence, and the mere fact that he visited the complainant's house is no reason for rejecting his evidence as false. M. Roshan Khan the veterinary assistant, Azamgarh, gives similar evidence and says that he has used the road not only to visit the complainant but to visit the bangalow of Munshi Muhammad Idris who is said to be a Deputy Collector living at Sidhari. The evidence called for the defence does not rebut this case; indeed it contains a good deal to support it. These witnesses put forward the false story of the drain having been in existence for ten or fifteen years but the very first witness admits that all the Babus, i. e. the zemindars, and other persons go via that path. In fact the main burden of his evidence was that the drain was old and did not constitute an obstruction. The defendant has in fact not relied on his oral evidence in this Court. He relies entirely on the fact that the plot in suit was not shown as road but as waste land at the settlement, and that it was divided between the different co-sharers at the partition. The former fact is not conclusive, and as to the latter the amin who carried out the partition has been called and he deposes that all the public paths of the village were divided up between the co-sharers at the partition. It appears to me therefore that this is emphatically not a case in which this Court would be justified in interfering in revision on the facts and I would reject the application.

[The Case was then laid up for opinion of a third Judge when the following judgment was delivered.]

Walsh, J.—In this case a Magistrate on the complaint of one Abdullah Khan, has ordered his neighbour one Abdul Wahid to remove a nuisance, to wit, a drain dug in an alleged public road in front of the latter's house so as to obstruct the passage of the public and of the complainant. The order was made under S. 133 of the Criminal Procedure Code. An application in revision was made to the Sessions Court of Azamgarh. The Sessions Judge being of opinion that in substance there was no evidence upon which it could properly be held that the road was a public way, and that it was an abuse of the process of the Court to attempt to put the powers under this section in motion at all, referred the matter to the High Court. Mr. Justice Daniels, before whom it came, referred it to a Bench of two Judges; in due course, it came before Mr. Justice Lindsay and Mr. Justice Daniels, and a difference of opinion has arisen both as to whether it could properly be held on the evidence to be a public road, and further, whether, assuming the view of the Magistrate to be erroneous, it was not a merely debateable question of fact with the decision of which this Court ought not, following the well established principles, to refuse to interfere.

In my opinion, there is, upon the evidence no real controversy of fact at all, except in so far as the question whether an inferance of prior dedication to be drawn from an admitted state of facts, may be said to be itself a question of fact. It is, perhaps, more properly described as a mixed question of fact and law. It will, therefore, be convenient to set out the history of this way as disclosed by the evidence.

The way is kachcha. It has never been properly made up, and it has certainly never been repaired by any public authority, even if any kind of casual repair has ever been done to it. It forms a kind of irregular or tortuous base to a triangle, the sides of which consist of two pakka roads which may be described as main roads, and which are undoubtedly roads vested in the district authority. The appex of the triangle is formed by the junction of these two main roads where they intersect at right angles. It might be described as a short cut or loop, connecting these two roads, and cutting off the two sides of the triangle. But its construction, and course, as well as the absence of any work of repair to it by the road authority, all show that it was not brought into existence to serve this purpose. It passes the houses of the complainant and defendant who were formerly co-sharers. It clearly came into existence as a village by-road or path, for the use and benefit of the persons owning, or occupying, or wishing to visit the houses and lands which it feeds. The uncontradicted evidence, for example, that of a Secretary to a Municipal Board, and of a Veterinary Surgeon, shows that it has been used indifferently by members of the public visiting the places or persons abutting on the road, without objection, though this user must in the nature of things have been quite casual and intermittent. This sort of user is a common incident in the case of all private roads which serve some purpose other than purposes exclusively those of the owner, who would not be likely to interfere, even if he knew of it, if it did not injuriously affect his own interests and it certainly cannot, suo motu, be treated as a ground for converting a private way, if it is one, into a public way. The patwari has known and used this road for many years, and is quite satisfied that it is public. But it would be unreasonable to expect, in the case of such an obvious local convenience, the use of which created no nuisance, a village owner, to make himself generally unpopular by interference with every isolated user of this kind or with user by villagers. It is equally true that if he wished to interfere, he might find the labour of doing so a greater burden than the maintenance of his right was worth, and so be persuaded to let the latter go, and throw the road definitely open to the public by a tacit dedication. In England landowners were very fond of doing this in order to throw the burden of repair on to the rates, until the Highways Act of 1835 intervened, and prevented automatic dedication without certain formalities, which included the consent of the road authority and their right to require the road to be properly made up first.

It therefore becomes material to inquire when, and in what way, the act of dedication, other than that to be inferred from subsequent permissive user is said to have taken place, and what evidence of it is to be found in the documents. It is to be observed that originally, before partition, the land was held jointly by co-sharers. This fact makes the necessity of inquiring when the dedication was made all the more material. It was admitted in argument before me that it could not be suggested that it had been made since the partition. But one co-sharer of an undivided share cannot dedicate to the public a way over the common estate without the consent of his co-owners. The act must be the concerted act, at one given moment, of all the joint owners. It is odd that the complainant himself, who must be taken to be either one of the original dedicators, or the successor-in-title, did not venture to assist the Court in this matter by explaining how it happened. Indeed the language of his complaint indicated (though it would be unduly hard to infer much from this fact) that he regarded the way as appurtenant to his own residence, and the user as mainly for those who came there. Neither the judgment of the Magistrate, nor that of Mr. Justice Daniels, contains any finding as to the actual dedication. The truth is, that not only is there no evidence of a joint dedication but that such evidence as there is, is inconsistent with it. At the settlement in 1901 the plot or soil over which the way passes was described as "waste" or "fallow", and not as "rasta". By the partition in 1910 all village paths remained joint, and were allotted to those who had jointly held the lands over which such ways passed. This was a just and almost inevitable proceeding, and in the absence of clear evidence of a prior dedication is really fatal to this claim. I come therefore, to the conclusion that, upon the admitted and uncontradicted facts of the case as presented in evidence by both sides (disregarding the foolish and dishonest allegation by the defence that the drain itself was old) a Judge would have to direct a jury that there was no evidence upon which they could find that there had ever been a dedication, and that a finding in the affirmative would really be perverse.

As to the question of jurisdiction my brothers are agreed, and perhaps it does not fall to me to express any opinion. But the whole case is before me, and I will merely content myself with saying that I agree that the Magistrate had jurisdiction. The fallacy in Emperor v. Dost Mohammad (1) lies in the confusion between jurisdiction and discretion, which latter was the second point left more or less open by the Full Bench in Ram Saugar Mandal v. Alek Naskar (2). The section is quite plain. The Magistrate must deal with an alleged "public" way even though it is disputed. But it is obvious that these summary powers were primarily intended to be exercised in cases where there was no question that the way was one vested in the public, and when that question is seriously disputed, and its decision becomes a difficult matter of mixed fact and law, a Magistrate clearly has jurisdiction to exercise his discretion by declining to decide it, and sending the parties to a Civil Court. It is impossible to peruse the judgment of the Magistrate in this case without realizing that he failed to appreciate the principles of law underlying a controversy of this kind. You cannot convert private property into public merely because it looks as though it ought to be, and because to do so would be convenient to a section of the public who have enjoyed permissive user over it, and I agree with the Sessions Judge that the Magistrate ought in this case to have declined to decide it.

Finally, I hold that in finding that this was a public way the Magistrate misdirected himself, and did so without any evidence to justify such a finding; that the complaint, whatever trespass the act committed upon the complainant's joint rights over the private way may have amounted to, which is a matter for a Civil Court, was an abuse of S. 133 of the Criminal Procedure Code; that the reference must be accepted, and the whole proceedings set aside.

Railways Act, S. 72—Risk note for "B"—'Loss'—Burden of proof.

In case of short delivery the defendant Railway must prove loss of the goods, and it is only after they have proved this that the plaintiff can be required to prove that the loss was due to a cause for which the railway company would be liable. (45 B 1201; 1923 All. 426, ref.) The word 'loss' means loss by the railway company and not loss to the plaintiff. [P. 7 C. 2; P. 8 C. 1]

L. P. Zutshi—for Applicants.

N. C. Vaish—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—This revision raises a question of the liability of a railway company in respect of goods consigned under risk note B. In this form of risk note the consignor in view of reduced rate of freight agrees to hold the railway.

"Harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss, destruction, or deterioration of, or damage to the said consignment, from any cause whatever except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages..... due either to the wilful neglect of the railway administration or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants ..... (with a further proviso) that wilful neglect shall not be held to include fire, robbery from a running train or any other unforeseen event or accident".

126 bags of sugar were consigned to the plaintiff under a risk note in this form. On taking delivery the number was found to be short by three bags. The plaint alleges that in consequence of this short delivery the plaintiffs have suffered loss to the amount claimed. In defence the railway company set up the risk note and they further alleged that in this case the loss of the bags was due to theft from a running train. It has been held that in this connection the terms robbery and theft are equivalent (45 All. 56). The case was tried in the Small Cause Court. The view of the learned Judge of the Court below was that as the Plaintiff did not allege in his plaint that the goods were lost but merely that he had not received them, it lay on the defendants to prove loss of the goods, and it was only after they had proved this that the plaintiff could be required to prove that the loss was due to a cause for which the railway company would be liable. In support of this view the learned Judge relies on the case of Ghelabhai v. E. I. Ry. Co. (1) though the learned Judge prefers to cite the case from some volume of private reports. The same view was taken by Lindsay, J. in Secretary of State v. Jiwan (2) in a case in which a consignment of food had rotted owing to delay in transit and the plaintiff had suffered loss in consequence. The delay was found to be due to the wilful neglect of the railway company. The goods were consigned under risk note B as in the present case. The risk note gave the railway absolute protection in respect of damage to the goods. It did not protect them against loss if the loss was due to the wilful neglect of their servants. The learned Judge held that "loss" meant loss by the railway company and not loss to the plaintiff. On this view the plaintiff is entitled to a decree in the present case. In that case the plaintiffs were suing for something which was prima facie within the protection afforded by the risk note, namely, damage to the goods. Therefore in the absence of proof of loss the suit failed. Here the plaintiffs are suing for something which is prima facie outside the protection afforded by the note, namely, breach of the contract to deliver. In the absence of evidence of loss the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. No doubt a different view has been taken by the Punjab High Court (Hill, Sawyers & Co. v. Secretary of State (3) but the Subordinate Judge was bound to follow the rulings of this Court.

Reliance is placed by the respondent on E. I. Ry. v. Nathmal (4) and Smith v. G. W. Ry. Co. (5). In both these cases the loss of the goods was admitted by the plaintiffs. In the former case the goods were missing on the arrival of the train at its destination. In the English case it is specifically stated in the last paragraph of Lord Wrenbury's judgment that the plaintiff alleged the loss of the goods. The argument turned on whether wilful negligence could be assumed from the mere fact of non-delivery. Moreover, the protection given to the railway was in wider terms and included delay or detention.

For the above reasons I am unable to accept this revision which I accordingly dismiss with costs.

Judgment.—This is a revision directed against an order of the Small Cause Court and raises a question of the liability of the Railway Company under risk note B. The goods in question were consigned from Tarighat near Ghazipore on the E. I. Ry. to Manbhum on 26th January 1922. The goods were not lost nor were they destroyed but the Railway Coy. took five months to convey them and they did not reach their destination until 25th June 1922. The delay was unquestionably unreasonable. The trial Court finds that owing to this delay damage was suffered by the plaintiff quite independently of any deterioration of the goods. The ghee was in fact sent with a view to a marriage which had already taken place before the consignment was received. The risk note B under which the goods were despatched protected the Railway Coy. from any claim for damages due to the loss, destruction or deterioration of the goods or for damage to the consignment except in certain specified cases. On the finding of fact of the Court below the cause of action in this case was not due to any of the special events against which the Railway is protected by the risk note. It was therefore outside the protection afforded by the note and the cases in Ram Kishun Ram v. N. W. Ry. Co. (1) and Secretary of State v. Jiwan (2) are distinguishable. The case is somewhat similar to E. I. Rly. Co. v. Kishin Lal (3) recently decided by me. On the finding of fact of the Court below the revision cannot succeed and I accordingly dismiss it with costs.

A ground that the damages were wrongly assessed was taken in the grounds of revision but was not argued and I cannot therefore take notice of it.

Judgment.—Maqsud Husain and Musammat Allahbandi were convicted by a Magistrate of the first class under S. 297 of the Indian Penal Code. Their appeal was rejected by the learned Sessions Judge and they have come here in revision. The facts found are as follows :—

In muhalla Kal in the town of Sambhal there is a mosque, now somewhat dilapidated, which was built by the father of Khan Bahadur Khan the chief witness in the case. On the night of the 11th October last which was the chehlum, there were illuminations in this muhalla. Khan Bahadur Khan was one of the persons who had organised these illuminations and at about 11 0'clock that night he was about to enter the mosque to say his evening prayers when in consequence of information given to him by some boys he went back to the illuminations and fetched three other Muhamedans and entered the mosque. There they found Muqsud Husain and Musammat Allahbandi lying on a cot having sexual connection. The witnesses ran up and seized them both and dragged them outside. A number of Muhamedans at once came up and were so horrified at the desecration of the mosque that they handled the accused somewhat roughly. These are the facts found and they are amply borne out by the evidence. The learned Counsel for the applicants raises two points (1). That no trespass has been proved against the accused within the meaning of the section.

He argues that the word "trespass" in that section must have the same meaning as criminal trespass in other parts of the Code. As long ago as 1896 it was held by a learned Judge of this Court in Queen Empress v. Subhan (1) that the word trespass in the section must be taken in its original meaning and as a word which covered any injury or offence done and to couple it with entry upon property. That decision has remained unchallenged for 27 years. It was quoted with approval in Emperor v Ram Prasad (2) by a Divisional Bench of this Court and the same view seems to have been taken by a Bench of the Madras High Court In re Ratna Mudali (3). In my opinion this argument therefore fails.

The second argument put forward is that what really happened was that the accused and the woman had gone into the mosque solely with the intention of looking at the illuminations and had taken the cot with them merely to sit on it when under a moment of impulse they misconducted themselves, and that therefore, there was no intent within the meaning of the section. I do not propose even to consider this argument because it is based only on the ingenuity of Counsel and is not supported by any evidence and is in fact flatly contradicted by the statements of the accused themselves and their evidence. According to them they were not inside the mosque at all. There was no cot and there was no misconduct. The conviction therefore in my opinion was right and the sentence appropriate. I reject the application.

L. P. A. No. 128 of 1921, D/-9th February 1923, from the Judgment of Stuart, J. D/- 13th July 1921.

Civil P. C. S. 11—Decision in previous suit when res judicata.

Even though the property in dispute in the previous suit does not comprise the whole of the property in dispute in the subsequent suit but the question of plaintiff's title is identical and is decided in that suit the same question cannot be raised and decided in subsequent suit. [P 10 C 2]

S. N. Sen—for Appellant.

M. L. Agarwala and P. L. Banerji—for Respondent.

Banerji, J.—The question in this case is whether a previous decision operates as res judicata under the provisions of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff claims certain property by virtue of a sale deed, dated 29th of July 1917. Before the institution of the present suit the defendant had brought a suit in the Revenue Court to eject the plaintiff from 5 plots out of the property comprised in the sale deed, on the allegation that the plaintiff was the tenant of the defendant. In that suit the plaintiff claimed proprietary title in respect of that property by virtue of the sale deed, which is the basis of the present claim in this suit. The Revenue Court, upon that plea being raised, could have adopted one of two courses. It might have referred the parties to the Civil Court, or it might have constituted itself a Civil Court and tried the question itself. It did not refer the parties to the Civil Court and must be deemed to have elected to try the question of title. Its decision was adverse to the present plaintiff, who was defendant in the previous suit, and the Court held that the plaintiff had failed to prove the proprietary right set up by him. In the present suit the plaintiff claims not only the plots which were in dispute in the suit in the Revenue Court but also other plots. It has been held that the present claim is barred by reason of the decision in the previous suit. The decision in that suit must be deemed to be the decision of a Civil Court. It is true that the property in dispute in the previous suit did not comprise the whole of the property now in dispute but the question of the plaintiff's title to both descriptions of property is identical and must be deemed to have been decided in that suit. The decision negatived the title, and therefore the issue as to the title must be deemed to have been decided in the previous suit. As we have stated above the Court in the previous suit was by reason of the action taken by it equivalent to a Civil Court which could have tried the subsequent suit. The title of the plaintiff was the matter in issue in the previous suit and having been once decided against the plaintiff, it cannot be raised and decided in this subsequent suit. In this view this appeal is not sustainable and is dismissed with costs.

Mortgage—Suit for sale of half the property—One of the mortgagees a part owner.

Ordinarily the acquisition of a share in the equity of redemption by one only of several mortgagees does not necessarily break up the integrity of the mortgage so as to entitle a mortgagor, interested in only a fractional part of the property, to redeem his share on payment of a proportionate amount. But when the mortgagees sue for only half the mortgage money they must be deemed to have practically admitted that something has happened which has had the effect of satisfying half the mortgage amount, and therefore it would be highly inequitable to allow the plaintiffs to throw the burden of their share of the mortgage money on the whole property. They will be allowed to sell only a proportionate part of the property. [P. 11 C. 2; P. 12 C. 1]

U. S, Bajpai—for Appellant.

S. N. Gupta—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit for sale on the basis of a mortgage deed, dated the 21st of September, 1910, executed by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and the father of defendant No. 3 in favour of Plaintiff No. 1, the father of Plaintiff No. 2, and Mohan Lal, defendant No. 4. The plaintiffs' case was that they were entitled to half the mortgage money while Mohan Lal was the owner of the other half, but as Mohan Lal had purchased the entire equity of redemption in execution of a simple money decree they sued to recover only half the mortgage money by sale of the entire mortgaged property. The pleas raised in defence by the contesting defendant Mohan Lal were (1) that the money was advanced by him alone and he was the sole mortgagee, the other names having been entered only fictitiously, and (2) that in any case the plaintiffs were entitled to sell only half of the mortgaged property.

The Court of first instance came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had a share in the mortgagee rights, and held that out of the mortgage money amounting to Rs. 500 the plaintiffs had contributed two sums of Rs. 75 and Rs. 87-8-0, and it gave them a decree for these two sums plus interest, but directed that the amount be realized by sale of the entire mortgaged property. This decree has been affirmed on appeal.

The defendant has come up in second appeal to this Court and two main points are urged. The first is that the sum of Rs. 75 paid by the plaintiffs was included in the sum of Rs. 87-8-0 referred to in the written statement. This contention has no force. The sum of Rs. 75 has been proved to the satisfaction of both the Courts below to have been paid by the plaintiffs direct to Musammat Manbhari, a previous creditor mentioned in the deed, whereas Rs. 87-8-0 is an item which is found to have been paid to Mohan Lal, defendant, himself towards the bond in suit.

The second point raised is as to the plaintiffs' right to sell the whole mortgaged property.

Now, it may be that in order to effact a merger the two rights must be co-extensive in some share, howsoever small, though one be higher than the other, and that ordinarily the acquisition of a share in the equity of redemption by one only of several mortgagees does not necessarily break up the integrity of the mortgage so as to entitle a mortgagor, interested in only a fractional part of property, to redeem his share on payment of a proportionate amount. In such cases the other mortgagees, who have neither expressly nor by implication agreed to the breaking up of the integrity, may successfully resist the claim. But that point does not arise in the present case which stands on quite a different footing. Here the plaintiffs, in suing for only half the mortgage money have practically admitted that something has happened which has had the effect of satisfying half the mortgage amount. It would be highly inequitable to allow the plaintiffs to throw the burden of their share of the mortgage money on the whole property for it may very well place the defendant in a very much worse position than he might have been in but for the auction purchase. Had the plaintiffs treated the mortgage as being still intact and sued for the whole sum, impleading Mohan Lol merely as a representative of the mortgagors, and agreed to share with Mohan Lal either the sale proceeds or the property purchased in execution of the mortgage decree, the case might have been different. But to permit the plaintiffs to sell the whole property in order to realize simply their share of the mortgage money would be grossly unjust, as it may possibly result in Mohan Lal's losing his share of the mortgage money as well as the mortgaged property. The plaintiffs by suing for only their share of the mortgage money must be deemed to have admitted that the balance of the mortgage money has been satisfied by the acquisition of a proportionate share of the mortgaged property.

We are therefore distinctly of opinion that in the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs should be given a decree to recover their share of the mortgage money as against a proportionate part of the mortgaged property only, which comes to Rs. 162-8-0/ Rs. 500 = 13/40.

We accordingly allow the appeal and modify the decree of the Courts below, directing that the amount decreed be realized by sale of only 13/40 of the mortgaged properties. A fresh decree under order 34, rule 4, will be prepared. We extend the time for payment up to six months from this date.

Appeal allowed.

F. A. No. 304 of 1920, D/- 2nd July 1923, from the decree of the Sub. J., Farrukhabad, D/- 31st July, 1920.

Contract Act, S. 25—New contract—Statement of pleader does not give rise to.

While a suit was pending the pleader for the defendants stated that if the plaintiff presented probate or Letters of Administration or succession certificate the defendants would have no objection to pay him the amount in dispute with interest thereon for six months.

Held: that the pleader who made the statement had no general or special authority from the defendant which would entitle him to enter into a contract on their behalf to pay a time-barred debt and therefore this statement was not a new contract within S. 25 (3) so as to give rise to a fresh cause of action, especially when there is nothing whatever to show that the record of the statement made by the pleader was signed by the pleader or by any other agent. [P 15 C 1]

G. Agarwala and U. S. Bajpai—for Appellants.

K. N. Katju and H. K. Kaul—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought to recover a sum of Rs. 17,000/- odd, the defendants in the case being Babu Lal and Kishun Gopal sons of Kedar Nath. These defendants apparently are the owners of the firm called "Babu Lal and Kedar Nath" carrying on business at Cawnpore. The firm has become insolvent and the estate of the defendants is now represented by the Official Receiver.

The plaintiffs in the suit are the descendants of one Bhawani Shanker who died on the 12th of Frbruary 1912. This man Bhawani Shanker owned a business at Farrukhabad which was carried on in the name of Mahanand Ram Bhawani Shanker.

On the 27th or 28th of December, 1911 Bhawani Shanker sent certain Hundis to the defendant firm at Cawnpore for realisation and credit to his account.

It is stated that the directions to the defendant firm were that the money should be treated as a fixed deposit payable six months after date.

On the 8th of February 1912 Bhawani Shanker wrote a letter to the defendant firm with respect to this deposit. He directed the defendants to open a fresh account in his name and to credit him with a sum of Rs.12,000/- and in his letter he stated that this sum was to be applied for the purpose of educating five boys of his community to enable them to pass the LL. B. and Pleadership examination of the High Court.

This letter was received by the defendant firm and was answered by a letter dated the 9th February 1912 which is to be found at page 1 of the supplemental book A.

Four days after he wrote this letter Bhawani Shanker died. After this, certain claims were presented to the defendant firm in respect of this money and one of the claimants was Mohan Lal who apparently had succeeded to the business of Bhawani Shanker of Farrukhabad.

The defendant firm having these several claims made against it refused to pay until one or other of the claimants had established his title to the money.

The result of all this was that a suit was filed on the 29th June 1915 by Mohan Lal against the defendant firm claiming this money.

That suit was resisted on several grounds. One of the pleas in defence taken was that the money was trust money and that the plaintiff Mohan Lal could not recover it. Another plea was a plea of limitation.

In the course of the trial of that suit a certain statement was made on behalf of the defendant firm by the pleader who was engaged to conduct the defence.

On the 23rd November 1915 while the suit was still pending the pleader for the defendants stated that if the plaintiff Mohan Lal presented probate or Letters of Administration or a succession certificate the defendants would have no objection to pay him the amount in dispute with interest thereon for six months.

The suit was however dismissed by the subordinate Judge on the 27th January 1916 on the ground that the plaintiff, Mohan Lal had failed to obtain a succession certificate. This order dismissing the suit was confirmed in appeal by this Court.

At the time the suit brought by Mohan Lal was pending in the Court of the subordinate Judge proceedings were going on in the Court of the District Judge for the purpose of obtaining a succession certificate. For one reason or another this certificate was not obtained till the month of December 1913. Mohan Lal has since died and now we have the present suit instituted on the 27th January 1920.

We have to deal here with two pleas which were raised in defence. One was that the money held by the defendant firm was trust money which Bhawani Shanker had made over for the purpose specified in his letter of the 8th February 1912. It was pleaded that the present plaintiffs had no right to have the money. The other plea taken was that the suit was barred by time.

The learned subordinate Judge was of opinion that the suit was not barred by limitation. On the other hand he was of opinion that the money had been dedicated in trust for the purposes specified in the letter of Bhawani Shanker which he wrote in the month of February 1912. The result of the proceedings in the Court below was that the suit was dismissed.

In appeal two points are raised before us. It is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs appellants that the Court below was wrong in holding that a trust had been created and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the sum in dispute. On the other hand the learned Advocate who represents the Official Receiver supports the judgment of the Court below on the ground that the suit was barred by limitation.

We will deal with this latter point first.

On the face of it the suit as a suit for recovery of money which was deposited in December 1911 and which was payable in June 1912 is time-barred but the plaintiffs claim to be suing on a fresh cause of action arising out of what took place in the earlier suit on the 23rd of November 1915

The plaintiffs founded their cause of action upon the statement made by the pleader for the defendant firm in that earlier case, the statement to which we have already referred. It was not pleaded that anything contained in this statement amounted to an acknowledgment which would extend the period of limitation. Obviously no such plea could be taken for the statement, whatever it amounted to, was made after the period of limitation had expired.

But what the plaintiffs say is this. They contend that the statement made by the pleader on the 23rd November 1915 gave rise to a new contract under S. 25 of the Indian Contract Act.

Under the section in question a promise made in writing and signed by the person to be charged therewith or by his agent generally or specially authorised in that behalf, to pay wholly or in part a debt of which the creditor might have enforced payment but for the law of limitation is a valid and binding contract.

And so it is argued that when the pleader stated that the defendant firm had no objection to pay the money claimed to the plaintiffs if the plaintiffs succeeded in getting Probate or Letters of Administration or a Succession Certificate, a fresh contract was entered into and it is further argued that a suit on this contract is within time on the ground that the promise was conditional upon the plaintiffs obtaining a succession certificate. As that certificate was not obtained till the month of December 1918 it was argued that this suit instituted in January 1920 was within limitation.

In our opinion the judgment of the subordinate Judge on this issue is erroneous.

In order to establish a valid contract under S. 25 of the Contract Act it is necessary to show that a promise was made in writing and that this writing was signed by the person to be charged therewith or was signed by his agent generally or specially authorised in that behalf.

It is argued for the respondents in the first place that there is no proof on the record that the pleader who made this statement was either generally or specially authorised to represent the defendants for the purpose of making a fresh contract under S. 25. We have here to notice what happened in the Court of the Subordinate Judge in the earlier suit. We have already mentioned that the defendants' pleader made the statement upon which the plaintiffs now rely on the 23rd of November 1915.

On the 17th January 1916 the defendants presented a petition in Court repudiating the statement which had been made on their behalf. It was stated in this petition that one Salik Ram the general attorney gave certain instructions to the pleader who was conducting the defence and that he had given these instructions without any authority. It was stated clearly in this petition that the defendant firm had not relinquished any of the pleas which they had raised in their written statment of defence. An affidavit was put in support of this application.

The subordinate Judge at that time dealt with this application in his order of 17th January 1916 which is printed at page 33 of the paper book He rejected the petition saying that the Vakil had not exceeded his authority inasmuch as he was "competent to abandon any issue or plea."

As the case stands we have no proof at all that the pleader, who made the statement relied upon, had any general or special authority from the defendant firm which would entitle him to enter into a contract on their behalf to pay a time-barred debt. The pleader's authority was confined to the conduct of the case and the subordinate Judge rightly observed that he was competent to abandon any issue or plea. All that his statement amounted to was that if during the pendency of the suit the plaintiff Mohan Lal obtained a succession certificate the defendants were ready to submit to a decree for the amount claimed together with interest for six months. We have already mentioned that the suit was dismissed a couple of months later on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to take out a succession certificate. We cannot therefore treat this statement as showing in any way that the pleader who made it had authority to bind the defendant firm by a fresh contract under S. 25 of the Contract Act.

Another point which had to be noticed is this. In order that a valid contract may be constituted under S. 25 (3) of the Contract Act it is necessary that the statement should be in writing and should be signed by the person to be charged therewith or by his agent generally or specially authorised. There is nothing whatever before us to show that the record of the statement made by the pleader on the 23rd November 1915 was signed by the pleader or by any other agent. All we have got before us is a certified copy of an entry which we take to have been written on the order sheet recording the statement made by the pleader. There is nothing whatever to show that this statement is signed by anybody except perhaps the subordinate Judge who is responsible for initialling the entries on the order-sheet. This matter seems to have escaped the notice of the learned subordinate judge and we think therefore that he was wrong in holding that the statement made by the pleader on the 23rd November 1915 gave rise to a new contract and to a fresh cause of action.

This being so, the plaintiffs can only fall back upon the original cause of action and as we have already pointed out a suit on that cause of action is long time-barred.

In this view of the case it is not necessary for us to discuss the other question, namely, whether there was good dedication of this fund to trust purposes and we therefore abstain from saying anything beyond this, namely, that Dr. Katju who represents the Official Receiver admits that this money was held in trust by the defendant firm.

The result therefore is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

F. A. No. 354 of 1920, D/- 12th June, 1923 from the decree of the Sub. J. Shahjahanpur, D/-17th January 1920.

Hindu Law—Succession—Stridhan—Daughter inheriting stridhan takes a limited estate—Benares School.

A female taking property by inheritance from her mother, does not take it as her own stridhan, but takes it with a limited estate, with the reverter after her death to the heirs of her predecessors i. e., the mother. 25 A 476 P.C.Foll,38 M. 1 and 17 C.911 Ref. [P.15 C.2]

Gulzari Lal, J. B. Lal and S. P. Sinha—for Appellants.

B. R. Dave and U. S. Bajpai—for Respondent.

Piggott, J.—This was a claim to certain property by inheritance. It was at one time the stridhan property of Musammat Sahodra, and descended after Sahodra's death to Musammat Ram Piari, her daughter. Ram Piari is now dead and the defendant in possession is Ram Kali, daughter of Ram Piari. The plaintiffs are the sons of one Ganga Din, who was a son of Musammat Sadodra. As the trial Court has rightly remarked, it is now quite settled law that Musammat Ram Piari, taking this property by inheritance from her mother, did not take it as her own stridhan, that she took it with a limited estate, with the reverter after her death to the heirs of her predecessor.

The question for dedermination then is whether the defendant Musammat Ram Kali, as the daughter's daughter of Musammat Sahodra, is a nearer heir to Musammat Sahodra than the two plaintiffs who are the son's son of that lady.

On behalf of the respondent it is contended that, under the Mitakshara school of law, there can be but one answer to this question, and that the daughter's daughter has the preference. In principle two other High Courts have undoubtedly affirmed the view that, in such a case as the present, we have to look to the stridhan heirs of the female in whose hands the property was held as stridhan, vide Subramanian Chetti v. Arunachelam chetty (1) and Huri Dayal Singh Sarmana v. Grish Chunder Mukerjee (2) Morevover, in the case of Sheo Pertab Bahadur Singh v. The Allahabad Bank (3) there is a very significant remark by their Lordships of the Privy Council inserted as a comment upon a dictum of the learned Judges of this Court who dealt with the same litigation at an earlier stage. Their Lordships had to deal with property which had been the stridhan of a lady named Kailash Kunwar and had passed from that lady to her daughter, Janki Kunwar. The main question which they had to determine was whether Janki Kunwar took that property from her mother with a limited estate, or whether the property itself remained stridhan in the hands of Janki Kunwar. Incidently however their Lordships discussed the question of the devolution of the property after Jangi Kunwar's death, and they quote a dictum of the learned Judges of this Court, to the effect that when Janki Kunwar died childless the succession necessarily went to the heirs of her father". After quoting this remark their Lordships add, "presumably as the stridhan heirs of her mother in the absence of lineal heirs of the latter". It seems to us quite clear from this passage that if their Lordships had to determine the devolution of the property then in suit upon the death of Janki Kunwar they would have looked for the stridhan heir of her mother Kailash Kunwar, and enquired who those heirs would be according to the school of law to which the parties in that litigation were subject. If these were the only authorities before us the point would seem almost too clear for argument. A certain difficulty has been created by an argument strongly pressed upon us by the learned counsel for the appellants, based upon the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sheo Shanker Lal v. Debi Sahai (4). The main question which their Lordships then had to decide was whether property inherited by a female from her mother was or was not stridhan in the hands of the female who so inherited it. That question, as we have already noticed, they answered in the negative. At page 471 of the report their Lordships say, "the precise question therefore arising for decision is whether, under the Hindu law of the Benares school, property which a woman has taken by inheritance from a female is her stridhan in such a sense that on her death it passes to her stridhan heirs in the female line to the exclusion of males". That was the only question really determined in the judgment. It must however be admitted that the defendants in that litigation were setting up, by way of jus tertii the rights of a daughter of the female who had received the property in suit by inheritance, and therefore a daughter's daughter of the female who last held that property as stridhan with full rights of ownership over the same. Their Lordships decided the case against the alleged jus tertii of this daughter's daughter. The learned Judges of the Madras High Court in the case which we have already referred to [Subramaniam v. Arunachalam (1)] discussing this point, assumed that the decision in Sheo Shanker Lal v. Debi Sahai (4) proceeded upon a very limited pleading. They assumed that the right set up by way of a jus tertii was the right of the daughter as such and that nothing was ever pleaded, and nothing was ever decided, about the rights of that same female as a daughter's daughter. Mr. Mayne on the other hand in his Commentary on the Hindu law states, with full knowledge of the facts, for he had himself argued the case before their Lordships of the Privy Council, that as a matter of fact the difficulty suggested above was brought to the notice of their Lordships, but was met by himself in argument by a plea based upon a suggested differentiation in the line of descent between different kinds of stridhan property. It seems sufficient for us to say that the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sheo Shanker Lal v. Debi Sahai (4) is really silent on the particular issue which we have now to determine. The question which their Lordships set out to decide we have already quoted from the judgment itself and the decision of that question does not determine the appeal before the Court. The further question raised regarding the result of the appeal in the case of Sheo Shanker Lal v. Debi Sahai (4) may be applicable either on the lines suggested by the learned Judges of the Madras High Court, or on the basis of the settlement made by Mr. J. B. Mayne in his commentary. We do not think that the arguments based upon the decision in this case can be allowed to outweigh the considered opinion expressed upon the same point in the case immediately following, that of Sheo Partab Bahadur Singh v. The Allahabad Bank (3) or that we ought, on the grounds taken by the learned counsel in support of the appeal, to dissent from the opinions of the learned Judges of the Madras and of the Calcutta High Courts in the cases we have already quoted. In our opinion therefore the decision of the trial Court was right: and we dismiss this appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

S. N. Sen, Damodar Das, K. N. Katju, Kumuda Prasad and Badri Narain—for Appellants.

B. E. O'Conor, Mukhtar Ahmed and N. P. Asthana—for Respondent.

Mears, C.J.—In the lower Court this was a suit for specific performance of a contract for sale embodied in a document dated the 2nd of December, 1918. That document set forth that a dispute had arisen between Musammnt Manki Kunwar and the defendant and other parties in like interest in relation to about 17 acres of land in Mauza Lachipur. That land had been bought by Gauri Shanker a few years before. That land was the subject of a pre-emption suit brought by the present plaintiff, which at the date of this agreement of the 2nd of December, 1918, had been through two Courts, and in each Court had been decided adversely to the lady. At the date of this agreement there was an appeal pending in the High Court with a view to put an end to the dispute relating to this land in Mauza Lachipur, and also with a view to put an end to a rivalry between the parties with regard to certain land under the control of the Maharaja of Benares, they entered into the agreement in suit. In substance, in certain events, the lady had to pay Rs. 5,000 in order to become the owner of the land in Mauza Lachipur; and as regards the other property, Mauza Saktanpur and other Mauzas, set out in the plaint, the parties were willing to become partners in that property, and partners on the basis of each taking a half. It appears that there were various.

persons who wished to acquire this property, and a man whose name is of no importance in the action, first offered a small amount of nazrana. The lady capped that by what became ultimately an offer of Rs. 10,000 and thereupon the defendant and his party added to it Rs. 1,000 making the offer Rs. 11,000. In this state of affairs the Court of His Highness the Maharaja of Benares looked into the matter, and by the 2nd of December all the parties to this suit had recognised the inadvisibility of bidding against each other, and indeed, on the 4th of January, 1919, they made it perfectly clear to the officers of His Highness that Rs. 11,000 would be paid—as to Rs. 5,500 by the lady and as to Rs. 5,500 by Gauri Shanker and his father-and they would be content each to receive one-half of the property. That is in fact what has happened.

The complaint of the present plaintiff was that in breach of the definite agreement the defendants had refused to convey to her the Lachipur property for the Rs. 5,000 set out in the agreement. The defendant, searching about for a defence, thought that some vague allegations of fraud would help him and embodied them in paragraph 4. The plaintiff did not apply for particulars of the fraud and the learned Subordinate Judge in entire disregard of the provisions of O. 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure proceeded to frame issues. The one relating to fraud was remarkable. It runs as follows :—Issue I (c) "Were there any allegations in connection with the pre-emption second appeal made with intense deception which affected the defendants as alleged in paragraph No. 4 of the written statement ? If so, how does that fact affect the claim ?"

It was the duty of the pleader for the plaintiff to apply to the Subordinate Judge to order the defendant to deliver further and better particulars of the charge of fraud. He did not do so. When settling issues it was the duty of the Judge himself to require the defendant to specify with particularity the nature of the fraud alleged. He should have done this in the interest of the plaintiff and because the rules require it and in the public interest. If Subordinate Judges would make the parties comply with reasonable strictness with the provisions of Order 6, cases would be more satisfactorily decided and a very large amount of public time would be saved in their disposal. with a corresponding benefit to litigants.

Taking the case of fraud as an illustration; the proper form of application in an ordinary suit where the plaintiff has alleged fraud vaguely would be somewhat as follows ;—"that the plaintiff be ordered within ten days to deliver to the defendant further and better particulars of the fraud alleged in paragraph ..... of the plaint stating.

(4) whether the representations alleged were verbal or in writing. If in writing, identifying and producing the document or documents for inspection ; if verbal, giving "the substance of each and every of the said representations and stating as regards each one the date when and the place where and the person by whom and the person to whom the said representation was made and that the plaintiff be precluded at the trial from giving any evidence of any representations other than those (if any) clearly pleaded in .... paragraph and the particulars to be delivered and that the plaintiff be ordered to pay Rs..... to the defendant as the costs of, and occasioned by, this application such payment to be made with the delivery of the particulars to be ordered."

Subordinate Judges should be watchful to see that in all cases the parties have pleaded their cases so plainly, fully and clearly that each side knows the nature of the case which has to be met, and this rule is one of general application. Frequently the result of ordinary particulars of nebulous claims and defences will be to make it manifest that the claim or defence has no substance.

A Subordinate Judge should, when ordering particulars to be given, order the party in default to pay a specified sum of costs to the other side for the costs occasioned by the application; such payment to be made on or before the delivery of the particulars. If the order is disobeyed and the plaintiff is in default, he should have his action stayed; and if the defendant is in default his defence should be struck out.

Particulars having been furnished the Judge should be careful at the trial to exclude all evidence which is not fairly covered by the original paragraph and the particulars and should give that as his reason.

Unless pleadings are definite a Judge is entirely at the mercy of the parties and has a difficulty in excluding evidence however irrelevant. The case is protracted and the opposite party, not infrequently, put in an unfair position. A defendant is entitled before delivering his written statement to have an order that the plaintiff shall deliver to him a pleading in compliance with Order 6. Equally a plaintiff is entitled, before being called to take any further step in the action, to have proper particulars of the defendant's written statement. If the Judge is of opinion that a groundless application is made to him, the party putting in the application should likewise be ordered to pay costs.

We have made these observations at length because we are persuaded that, without undue strictness or pedantry, every Subordinate Judge could effect a large saving of public time by requiring reasonable compliance with the existing rules, and we think that Subordinate Judges should entertain applications by the parties if made within a few days on the recipt by them of the plaint and written statement, respectively. Pleadings at present are not infrequently deliberately framed in the most general of terms and are involved, unsystematic, argumentative and indeed abusive. They should contain clear, definite allegations of fact, with, when occasion demands it, the necessary reference to statutory law.

In the particular case under consideration if the defendant had been made to specify in clear terms what was the nature of the fraud that he alleged, with the proper particulars which such a plea requires, it would have been found at once that there was no substance in his allegation. It now turns out that it condenses itself into this, that because the lady was alleging from first to last that she had a right of pre-emption, therefore she was guilty of deceipt or, to use the curious language of the Subordinate Judge as embodies in issue I (c) "intense deception." That is a phrase with which we are wholly unfamiliar. There is no doubt that the lady was alleging a right of pre-emption. It may have been a good claim, it may have been a bad claim. At the very time when the right of pre-emption was being asserted by her in the agreement of the 2nd of December, 1918, matters had reached the stage when two competent Courts had decided against her, and this was a fact that was known to the defendants; and yet it is said that the lady made statements as regards her right to pre-emption which were false to her knowledge, were intended to deceive, and in fact did deceive these defendants and caused them damage in that they were induced to enter into the contract because it is not put that way in the pleadings, that would have shown there was no substance in the plea. The learned Subordinate Judge, when he got into close quarters with the facts, said that he did not believe the defence allegation that the plaintiff got the agreement "through deceptive words". To prove a case of fraud it must be proved that representations were made which were false to the knowledge of the party making them or were such that the party making them could have no reasonable belief that they were true, that they were made for the purpose of being acted upon and believed, that they were belived and acted upon and caused the actual damage for which relief is claimed. We can find no possible answer of the defendant to this suit and we are of opinion that this is one of those cases in which specific performance of the contract must be declared, and that the Judge was right. We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

F. A. No. 50 of 1921, D/-3rd July, 1923, from the decree of the Sub. J., Allahabad, D/-14th January, 1921.

Mahomedan Law—Will—Shia Law-Will of life estate in entire property is equivalent to will of entire property.

A testator provided that his wife should be in possession of the whole of the estate for her life time, and that after her death his daughter's daughter would be the owner (malik) of the property; and after her, her male issue and failing male issue female issue would get the property, and failing these the grandsons of the sister would get it.

Held: that the will must be deemed to be a will of the entire property to the exclusion of daughter's daughter and unless she can be held to have assented to the will it would not be valid even as regards one-third. 30 All. 153 Foll. [P. 23 C. 1.]

Iqbal Ahmad—for Appellant.

Haider Mehdi, Raza Ali, A. Sanyal and K. N. Katju—for Respondents.

Banerjee, Ag. C. J.—This and the connected appeal No. 178 of 1921 arise out of a suit instituted by the plaintiff respondent for possession of immoveable as well as moveable properties of various descriptions. The bulk of this property is alleged to have belonged to one Abid Husain, who died in the year 1909. He left surviving him his widow, Musst. Amrit Bibi, the first defendant, a grand-daughter Musst. Umme Habiba (the daughter of a deceased daughter) and three grandsons of one of his sisters. These grand-sons are the defendants Nos. 2,3 and 4.

Abid Husain is said to have made a will in the year 1907, when he was going to Karbala. Musst. Umme Habiba died in 1919. The plaintiff is her husband and he claims a share in the property which according to him passed to Umme Habiba. If Abid Husain did not make a will 14 annas of his property would go under the Shia law, to which sect he belonged, to Musst. Umme Habiba and 2 annas to Musst. Amrit Bibi. Accordingly it is stated that Musst. Umme Habiba inherited 14 annas of the property, and the plaintiff as her husband is entitled to half of the aforesaid 14 annas, that is, to 7 annas out of 16 annas. The plaintiff denies the alleged will, and he also claims a declaration that the will was never made, and that if it was made it was invalid and could not have any operation under the Muhammedan Law.

The property claimed was of five descriptions. There was some zamindari property which is specified in schedule A annexed to the plaint. There was some house property mentioned in Schedule B. Schedule C specifies certain deposits in the Allahabad Bank and also in the Post Office Savings Bank. In Schedule D is specified certain jewellery and other moveable property which is alleged to have belonged to Umme Habiba. And Schedule E is property which the plaintiff alleges belonged to him, being cricket gear and articles of a similar nature. Out of the property mentioned in schedule D the plaintiff claims an 8 annas share.

The Court below has dismissed the claim in regard to the property mentioned in Schedules D and E, and has granted the plaintiff a decree for the share claimed by him out of other properties.

Appeal No. 50 of 1921 has been preferred by Musst. Amrit Bibi; and the connected appeal No. 178 of 1921 has been preferred by defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4. The plaintiff has filed cross-objections in respect of the portion of the claim which has been dismissed by the Court below.

We shall deal now with each description of property claimed by the plaintiff. First of all as to the zemindari property Musst. Amrit Bibi's defence was that her dower amounted to Rs. 51,000 and that she was in possession of the property in lieu of her dower. The Court below has found that the dower of the lady did not exceed Rs. 5,000 and that this Rs. 5,000 has already been realised by her out of the usufruct of the property, which she has been enjoiying since the death of her husband. The evidence as to the amount of the dower being in excess of Rs. 5,000 is very meagre. After the death of her husband an application was made by her for probate of the will of her husband, to which we have referred above. With the application for probate she filed an inventory and an affidavit, and in the affidavit she stated the amount of her dower to be Rs. 5000/-. No doubt she denies in the present suit that she had any knowledge of the contents of the affidavit or of the application. But it has been clearly proved that she did put her thumb impression to the affidavit, and that she swore it before an Honorary Magistrate, and was identified by a Mukhtar who has given evidence in the case. There is no reason to disbelieve the evidence of this Mukhtar and the Court below has believed him. It is clear that the lady admitted her dower to be Rs. 5000/; and that being so, the usufruct of the property was more than sufficient to wipe off the amount of her dower.

KASHMIR UNIVERSITY
Acc. No ...17706.....
Dated .....4.11.80.....

Her contention in regard to the house mentioned in list B is that it is her own property, and that the house which belonged to Abid Husain was appropriated by the East Indian Railway when the Railway line was first constructed. There is no evidence to show that the house of Abid Husain was appropriated by the Railway. On the contrary in the schedule of property, to which we have referred, she stated that the house belonged to Abid Husain. Further more there is the evidence of her own witnesses that the house was reconstructed by Abid Husain. So that there can be no doubt that the house did belong to Abid Husain and not to the defendant Amrit Bibi.

As regards the property mentioned in schedule C, that property consists of a deposit of Rs. 7000/- and odd in the Allahabad Bank, and of a further deposit of Rs. 1100/- in the Post Office Savings Bank. As regards the amount deposited in the Allahabad Bank, it has been clearly proved that Musst. Amrit Bibi went to the Bank in an ekka, affixed her thumb impression to the receipt granted to the Bank for the amount payable under the deposit receipts, one of which originally stood in the name of Abid Husain alone and the other jointly in her name and in the name of Abid Husain, and she directed the Bank clerks to make over the amount to the plaintiff who accompanied her to the Bank and identified her before the Bank Officials. The Bank officials proved that the money was actually handed over to the plaintiff. It is however stated on behalf of Musst. Amrit Bibi that the plaintiff himself appropriated the Rs. 7000/- and odd realised from the Bank and never paid it over to her. Against the statement of Musst. Amrit Bibi is the statement of the plaintiff himself in which he swears that he handed over the notes received from the Bank to Amrit Bibi and that she locked them up in her iron safe subsequently. It is most unlikely that the plaintiff was allowed to take away this large sum of Rs. 7000/- especially as at the time when the money was withdrawn the plaintiff was only a student in the College, and was quite a young man. On the other hand it is more probable that the lady herself kept the money in her iron safe. It is true there is no evidence to show what was the necessity for withdrawing the money from the Bank but the fact remains that the money was withdrawn and handed over by the Bank Officials to the plaintiff and afterwards remained in the custody of Amrit Bibi. This is further shown by the fact that one of the currency notes for Rs. 500/-received from the Bank, was lent by her to one Mital Prasad upon a promissory note. Mital Prasad has given evidence, and in his account book is mentioned the number of the note which he had received. The promissory note was in favour of Musst. Amrit Bibi and Mital Prasad has sworn that he got the money, namely the currency note for Rs. 500/- from Musst. Amrit Bibi's karinda. He has repaid the money, and he is in possession of the promissory note. It is suggested that the plaintiff returned the promissory note to him, and he has obtained a discharge in order that he might give evidence in favour of the plaintiff to the prejudice of the defendants. There is no valid reason for accepting this suggestion. The promissory not has been partially torn up and handed over to him. He deposed that he had in all probability made an entry of the repayment in his account book. That account book of course was not produced but we have the sworn statement and we have the other circumstance to which we have referred. The Court below has preferred to believe the statement of the plaintiff in this respect and we see no reason to come to a different conclusion.

As regards the amount of one of the fixed deposit receipts which stood in the name of Abid Hussin and his wife Musst. Amrit Bibi, it was urged that half of that amount must be deemed to have belonged to Musst. Amrit Bibi herself. There is nothing to justify this contention: on the contrary in the written statement she admitted that the moneys mentioned in list C belonged to Abid Husain.

As for the Rs. 1,100 in deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank, it was said in the plaint that Amrit Bibi had withdrawn that amount. There is no evidence that she did so but the fact that the money was in deposit was admitted by her in her written statement, and if it is still in the bank and has not been realised by her, she will be entitled to withdraw the whole of it from the Savings Bank, and the passing of a decree against her for recovery of the plaintiff's share of the amount of that deposit will in no respect prejudice her in this suit. We therefore see no reason to disturb the decree of the Court below as regards the deposit of 1100 in the Post Office Savings Bank.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad on behalf of Musst. Amrit Bibi raised a contention that the claim in regard to the deposits must be held to be time barred inasmuch as the money was withdrawn in 1915, and Musst. Umme Habiba was alive till 1919 and never claimed it. In the first place this contention was never put forward in the Court below. In the next place it is manifest from the evidence that the two ladies Amrit Bibi and Umme Habiba lived jointly and on most amicable terms. The possession of the money by Amrit Bibi was equivalent to possession by Musst. Umme Habiba. There was no conflict of interest between them and there was no occasion for her to demand this money from Musst. Amrit Bibi. In fact Musst. Umme Habiba had never been excluded from the ownership of this money and in her life-time her right had never been denied by Amrit Bibi. As regards this part of the claim therefore the appeal has in our opinion no force.

As regards the cross objections filed on behalf of the plaintiffs, the evidence is not satisfactory, and it has not been shown to our satisfaction that the finding of the Court below is erroneous.

The result therefore is that the appeal No. 50 of 1921 as well as the cross-objections filed in that appeal must fail.

As regards appeal No. 178 of 1921, it relates to the question of the will alleged to have been made by Abid Husain in 1907. The fact of the will is no longer denied and it must be taken for the purposes of this case that as a matter of fact the will was executed by Abid Husain. By that will he provided that Musst. Amrit Bibi should be in possession of the whole of the estate for her life time, and that after her death Musst. Umme Habiba would be the owner (malik) of the property; that after her, her male issue and failing male issue female issue would get the property, and failing these the defendants 2,3 and 4, the grandsons of the sister of Abid Husain, would get it. Under the Shia law the will would be valid to the extent of one-third even without the consent of the heirs: if it was a will of the entire property in favour of an heir it would not be valid unless the other heirs assented to it. The point was considered by this Court in the case of Fahmida

Khanum v. Jafri Khanum (1). In that case it was held that if a bequest was made of one-third only it would be valid ; but if the bequest was of the entire property it would not be valid even as regards one-third unless it was assented to after the death of the testator by the other heirs. In the present case the bequest was clearly one of the entire property. It is true that a life estate was given to Musst. Amrit Bibi, but it was a life estate in the whole of the property. Whereas if no will had been made she would have only got a 2 annas share and the grand-daughter of the testator would have got 14 annas. The effect of the will was to deprive the grand daughter of the testator of the 14 annas share which she would have at once inherited and to postpone her right to the 14 annas to the death of Amrit Bibi. This was an exclusion of the grand-daughter from a very considerable share of the property, and therefore the will in the present case must be deemed to be a will of the entire property to the exclusion of one of the heirs. Unless therefore Musst. Umme Habiba can be held to have assented to the will it would not be valid even as regards one-third. It is said that the assent to the will was given on her behalf by her father Jawad Husain. In the first place there is nothing to show that Jawad Husain ever assented to this will. It is true that as Mukhtar of Amrit Bibi he got the will registered and subsequently proceedings were taken for obtaining Probate of the will ; but he does not seem to have acted in his capacity as guardian of the minor and in those proceedings to have given his assent to the will, either expressly or impliedly. Musst. Umme Habiba was herself a minor, about 10 or 12 years of age, at the time of the death of Ahid Husain. She lived till she was about 22 years of age. But during this period she does not appear to have given her consent to the will, or to have in any other manner acquiesced in the will. There is nothing to show that she had any knowledge of the will or that she had ever seen it or heard of its contents. Two witnesses were no doubt examined who stated that the lady had said that she had no objection to her grand father's will. The lower Court has disbelieved these witnesses and we are not in a position to say that the conclusion of the Court below in that respect was erroneous. We think it very unlikely that Umme Habiba stated in the presence of these witnesses that she had no objection to the will and that she assented to it.

The appeal filed on behalf of the defendants Nos. 2,3 and 4, namely appeal No. 178 of 1921, also fails.

The result is that we dismiss both the appeals and the cross-objections with costs which in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Appeals dismissed.

It is only when the property has passed out of the family on account of an antecedent debt or where it has been sold by public auction, that the sons cannot challenge the alienation unless they show that the debt was tainted with immorality. It is not correct to say that in every case where the property has passed out of the family (though under a private sale not in lieu of any antecedent debt and even when the legal necessity has not been established) the sons cannot challenge it unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes. Where a property has been sold by the father and the sons bring a suit to recover it, and apparently the property has not been sold away at public auction, then it lies upon the transferee to justify the alienation of the estate by showing that the debt was in lieu of some antecedent debt or that the alienation was for some legal necessity. 39 A. 437 P. Judgment.—This is a plaintiffs appeal arising out of a suit for recovery of possession of a shop by avoidance of a sale deed, dated the 9th of August 1918, executed by the plaintiffs' father Girdhari Lal. The plaintiffs' case was that the property was ancestral and that the sale-deed was without any consideration and further that there was no legal necessity for it and that Girdhari Lal was a man of immoral character and habits and the debt, if any, had been tainted with immorality. On behalf of the defendants the allegations contained in the plaint were denied and it was urged that the sale was justified. The learned Subordinate Judge has rejected the evidence of the plaintiffs that Girdhari Lal was a man of immoral character and he has further held that there is no evidence whatsoever to connect the immorality alleged with the amount advanced under the deed. He has further held that the defendants vendees have shown that in fact part of the sum was paid in lieu of an antecedent debt and that there was legal necessity for the balance.

The plaintiffs have come up in appeal to this Court and challenge the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge.

The learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that it was the duty of the sons to show why they were not bound by their father's acts. For this view he relies on a passage in Dr. Gour's Hindu Code at p. 590 to the effect that the question of the burden of proof must depend upon whether the property has or has not passed out of the family by an alienation made by the father. If it has, then the son suing to dispossess the alienee must show why he is not bound by the father's alienation.

Reliance is placed on the authority of the earlier Privy Council cases, namely Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Prasad Singh (1) Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (2) and Bhagbut Prasad Singh v. Girja Koer (3) In all those cases the property had passed out of the family under an execution sale and it was after the execution sale that the sons wanted to challenge the alienation. As was pointed out in the first of these cases it is only "Where joint ancestral property has passed out of a joint family either under a conveyance executed by a father in consideration of an antecedent debt or in order to raise money to pay off an antecedent debt, or under a sale in execution of a decree for the father's debt, (that) his sons, by reason of their duty to pay their father's debts, cannot recover that property unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes, and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted, and secondly that the purchasers at an execution sale, being strangers to the suit, if they have no notice that the debts were so contracted, are not bound to make enquiry beyond what appears on the face of the proceedings." There was no departure in the last two cases from the rules of law laid down in the first case. In the recent case of Sahu Ram Chander v. Bhup Singh (4) their Lordships adhered to the interpretation put by Sir John Stanley in Chandradeo Singh v. Mata Prasad (5) on the pronouncement in the case of Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Prasad Singh (1) and remarked that a correct and useful statement of the law was that it was only where joint ancestral property has passed out of a joint family, either under a conveyance executed by a father in consideration of an antecedent debt or in order to raise money to pay off an antecedent debt or under a sale in execution of a decree for the father's debt, his sons, by reason of their duty to pay their father's debts, cannot recover that property. unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes and that purchasers had notice that they were so contracted.

It is quite clear therefore that it is only when the property has passed out of the family on account of an antecedent debt or where it has been sold by public auction, that the sons cannot challenge the alienation unless they show that the debt was tainted with immorality. It is not correct to say that in every case where the property has passed out of the family (though under a private sale not in lieu of any antecedent debt and even when the legal necessity has not been established) the sons cannot challenge it unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes. Where a property has been sold by the father and the sons bring a suit to recover it, and apparently the property has not been sold sway at public auction, then it lies upon the transferee to justify the alienation of the estate by showing that the debt was in lieu of some antecedent debt or that the alienation was for some legal necessity.

In the present case the document in question was in lieu of Rs. 7500/- It consisted of two items namely Rs. 1237-8-0 due on a promissory note for Rs. 1000/- said to have been executed on the 2nd of January 1917, and the balance of Rs. 6262-8 paid in cash before the Sub-Registrar.

As to the first item we think there can be no doubt that it had been paid prior to the execution of the sale-deed. We have the statement of Ram Saran Das vendee supported by an entry in the account books that the sum of Rs. 1000- had been borrowed on the 2nd of January 1917 by Girdhari Lal from him. The amount of the principal and interest due on it would come up to Rs 1237-8 Girdhari Lal has not gone into the witness-box to deny the passing of this part of consideration and in fact there is no evidence to contradict the vendee. We are therefore of opinion that this sum was due. This, being a debt due personally from the father and being antecedent in time to the transaction in question and not having been secured on the property, was clearly an antecedent debt and was binding on the family. As to the balance, the defendants' case is that Girdhari Lal was very much indebted and that there were numerous debts outstanding against him in the bazar. Before the execution of the sale-deed the vendee was assured by Girdhari Lal that he owed a number of these debts and was in urgent necessity to pay them. Ram Saran's version is that he actually made enquiries in the bazaar and learnt from a number of people that sums of money were due to them from Girdhari Lal; that after this enquiry he agreed to advance the money to Girdhari Lal. In support of this Ram Saran Das has gone into the witness-box and he has produced some of these creditors. Mohan Lal witness has stated that Rs. 1000 had been advanced by him to Girdhari Lal under a promissory note and that there are entries in his account books. Peare Lal another witness has sworn that a sum of Rs. 1150 was paid to him on account of the debt due to him. Ram Richpal Singh has stated that Rs. 880 were realised by him on the 9th August 1918 from Girdhari Lal and that there are entries in his account books to prove it. Another Ram Richpal Singh had proved that a sum of Rs. 662 was paid to him on the 28th October 1918 as part of the amount due on promissory note for Rs. 600 dated the 11th February 1916. We have also a statement of one Mohan Lal that on the 5th November 1918 he was paid Rs. 3,533 by Girdhari Lal. The total of these sums comes to Rs. 6,225. There is also evidence to the effect that there were other debts due from Girdhari Lal at the time the sale-deed was executed. The learned Subordinate Judge has believed the evidence of these witnesses except that of Peare Lal. The reason given by him for disbelieving this last mentioned witness is that he has not produced any bahi khata or documentary evidence in support of the alleged loan and that it is possible that he has come to support the defendant, he being a friend of his. Peare Lal apparently is a respectable witness. He pays Rs. 500 or 600 Government revenue and about Rs. 300 income-tax. He had stated that the money advanced had belonged to his wife, and it was on that account, that it was not entered in his bahi khata. We must say that we see no reason to disbelieve his statement. Peare Lal stated that he returned the document as soon as it was paid off which of course might have been done. In our opinion, therefore the defendant vendee had before taking the sale-deed made reasonable and sufficient enquiries to satisfy himself that antecedent debts were existing and that GirdhariLal had necessity to transfer the property in order to pay off those debts. It was not absolutely necessary for Ram Saran Das to prove how the money advanced by him was actually applied, but in this particular case, we are of opinion, that he has also proved that the greater part of this money was certainly applied for the purposes mentioned.

To disprove the existence of any legal necessity the plaintiffs led evidence to show that Girdhari Lal was a man of immoral character, that he had had two mistresses one after the other and was addicted to drinking and gambling. Four witnesses named Ashfaq Ali, Puran Devi, Ram Prasad and Shiam Sunder have been examined. Their evidence however is only of a general character and has been wholly rejected by the learned Subordinate Judge. We see no reason to differ from his view. Furthermore, the evidence of these witnesses does not in any way connect any of the items, proved by the defendant vendee, to have been due from Girdhari Lal with his immorality or gambling. We are therefore of opinion that it is not open to the plaintiffs to challenge this alienation without proving that these debts are tainted with immorality or illegality. This they have failed to do. The result is that this appeal fails and is hereby dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

T. P. Act, S. 83 — Deposit refused by mortgagee—Mortgage not extinguished.

The making by a mortgagor of a deposit, under S. 83 of the T. P. Act does not ipso facto extinguish the mortgage where the mortgagee has refused to accept the deposit. If the mortgagor is dissatisfied with the action of the mortgagee in refusing to accept the money deposited in full satisfaction of the mortgage he must bring a suit for the enforcement of his legal rights. Unless and until he does so successfully the mortgage still subsists. The fact that the mortgage had been followed by a contract of tenancy, the mortgagee having left the mortgagor in possession as his tenant, makes no differences. [P. 28 C. 1]

[The following is the Judgment of the Single Judge of the Hon'ble High Court from which the Letters Patent appeal was filed.—]

Stuart, J.—Sheikh Abdul Rahim executed a mortgage of a house in Agra, by way of conditional sale on the 26th June, 1910, in favour of Sheikh Ahmadulla for a consideration of Rs. 99-15-0. On the following day Abdul Rahim executed a Kerayanama by which he agreed to take the house for three years as tenant from the mortgagee on a monthly rent of one rupee. The deed provided for redemption within a period of six years. Sheikh Abdul Rahim continued in possession of the house during the period prescribed in the Kerayanama and afterwards. In the year 1918 he was still in possession, although the term of the Kerayanama had expired nearly 5 years before. He owed three years rent. He then mortgaged the property again to Musammat Mariam and it was agreed that she should pay Rs. 99-15-0 to redeem the first mortgage and Rs. 36, which he owed for rent to Ahmadullah. She accordingly paid Rs. 135-15-0 into Court under S. 83, Act IV of 1882, on the 3rd of April 1918. Ahmadullah refused to take the money out. Ahmadullah instituted a suit on the 4th of September 1918. He did not say anything in the plaint about the existence of the mortgage, or the fact that the mortgage money and the rent due, had been tendered to him. He stated, that Abdul Rahim was a monthly tenant of the house and that he had served a notice on him to quit because he had not paid three years rent. He sued for Rs. 36 rent and for the ejectment of Abdul Rahim. The learned Munsif dismissed the suit. He held, that although the mortgage was not extinguished by the tender, the tender was a good tender and a tender which the plaintiff ought to have accepted, and that, after the tender was made, the plaintiff's position resembled that of a trustee on behalf of the defendant. As the arrears of rent had also been tendered, he came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to eject the defendant or to any other relief. An appeal was filed to the Court of the Subordinate Judge. The learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the mortgage still existed, and that the plaintiff was entitled to possession as mortgagee and as landlord. He, therefore, decreed the suit. The case comes here in second appeal. The Courts below have not quite appreciated the facts. The mortgage is mortgage by conditional sale. It is not a usufructuary mortgage. It contained a clause that the mortgagor could not redeem after six years had elapsed. This clause could not operate to extinguish the mortgage until the plaintiff had obtained a decree for foreclosure. It is very clear what the plaintiff has done. He wishes to obtain the property. He has, therefore, refused to accept the tender. If he can get possession of the property, he thinks he will be in an assured position for then, if the defendant sues to redeem, he will put up against him the clause in the mortgage-deed debarring him from redemption after six years. I express no opinion on the value of this plea, but he evidently thinks it a good one. Unless he can obtain possession he will be in not so good a position for then he must apply for foreclosure and then the Court will be in a position, apart from the provisions of the deed, to allow the defendant an opportunity of redemption. This is, I think, the reason why he has said nothing about the terms of the mortgage-deed in his plaint. He has clearly brought this suit for ejectment of the defendant as his tenant in order to enforce his mortgage. The suit should have been a suit for foreclosure. For the reasons that the plaintiff has deliberately not disclosed the true facts and has sought a wrong remedy his suit must be dismissed. I, therefore, allow the appeal and direct that the plaintiff's suit stands dismissed. The plaintiff will pay his own costs and those of the defendants in all Courts.

On the Letters Patent appeal being heard the following Judgment was delivered :—

Judgment.—The facts out of which this appeal arises are best stated in the judgment of the lower appellate Court, dated the 24th of July, 1919, where the essential question for determination is clearly set forth. That question is whether the making, by a mortgagor, of a deposit under S. 83 of the Transfer of Property Act, ipso facto extinguishes the mortgage in spite of the fact that the mortgagee has refused to accept the deposit. In our opinion that question can only be answered as it was answered by the lower appellate Court: the mortgage is not extinguished. The parties remain in the relationship to one another of mortgagor and mortgagee. It is for the mortgagor, dissatisfied with the action of the mortgagee in refusing to accept the money deposited in full satisfaction of the mortgage, to bring a suit for the enforcement of his legal rights. Unless and until he does so successfully, the mortgage still subsists. There is some complication introduced into the present case by the fact that the mortgage had been followed by a contract of tenancy, the mortgagee having left the mortgagor in possession as his tenant. We do not see that this circumstance in any way affects the principle we have just laid down, or the applicability of that principle to the parties whose case is now before us. The mortgagee is constructively in possession of the property through his tenant, who happens to be also his mortgagor. He is entitled to a decree for ejectment. If the claim for rent, which was also put forward by the plaintiff in the suit, had been on account of rent falling due after the deposit made on behalf of the mortgagor, it would have been necessary for the Court to consider the operation of S. 84 of the Transfer of Property Act, No. IV of 1882. But the claim is on account of rent which fell due before that date. We think the decision of the lower appellate Court was right and that it should not have been disturbed by the learned Judge of this Court. We allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the learned Judge of the Court and restore that of the lower appellate Court. All costs in this Court will be paid by the defendant respondent.

Appeal allowed.

F. A. No. 66 of 1921, D/-14th May, 1923 from the S. J., Muzaffarnagar, dated the 8th January 1921.

Mahomedan Law — Waqf—Construction—Gift or waqf.

Under the terms of the deed named persons were to take the property becoming owners thereof immediately and they and their descendants after them were to enjoy the property for ever without any power to alienate. The word Waqf was used in more than one place by the executant in describing the document itself. But otherwise it was expressly and in terms a gift to three specified persons.

Held ; the mere use of the word "waqf" in a deed does not make it a waqf. [P. 29 C.1]

Piggott, J.—The question raised by this appeal is whether a certain deed of the 27th of March 1880 was a waqf under Muhammadan law that is to say, a dedication of property for charitable and religious purposes, or was a gift in favour of certain specified individuals. Under the terms of the deed certain named persons were to take the property becoming owners thereof immediately and they and their descendants after them were to enjoy the property for ever without power to alienate. If it was in fact a transfer by way of gift in favour of these specified donees then, as the Court below has rightly held, the condition against alienation fails and the descendants of the donees take the property with full ownership and power of alienation. If on the other hand the document in question is in law a deed of waqf, other consequences follow. It is quite true that the word "waqf" is used in more than one place by the executant in describing the document itself. On the other hand there is nothing in the wording of the deed which can possibly be stretched so as to constitute a transfer of ownership in favour of the deity. It is expressly and in terms a gift to three specified persons. It has been contended before us that the use of the word "waqf" overrides all other terms in the document, and necessarily involves a transfer of ownership in favour of the deity such as is required to constitute a valid dedication under Muhammedan law. We are not prepared to accept this contention. It has been urged once already in this Court in connection with this very document before a Bench of which one of us was a member, and was summarily rejected. The crucial passage, quoted from Mr. Syed Ameer Ali's book on Muhammedan law, at page 217 of the Fourth Edition is in the following words "when the word waqf, or any of its synonyms in vogue, is used in making the consecration the law fixes upon it all the legal incidents of a permanent and valid dedication." This statement of priniciple implies that there must be a consecration, in the making of which the word waqf is used. It seems to us that what we have before us here is a gift in favour of private individuals, which the donor in the course of the document wrongly describes as a "waqf". We think this is a distinction of principle on which this case must be decided. Agreeing with the decision of the Court below we dismiss this appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Judgment.—First Appeal Nos. 136 and 137 of 1921 are connected appeals by certain defendants arising out of two Suits for sale on the basis of two mortgage deeds of the same date, namely, the 2nd of June 1914.

The first of the two mortgage deeds was executed by Bhawani Prasad and others in favour of Hardeo Sahai, and the second by the same mortgagors in favour of Hukam Chand and Gauri Shanker. Under these two deeds amounts due under two prior mortgage deeds dated 16th of June 1894 and the 1st of March 1897 were paid off and only a sum of Rs. 500/- was paid in cash which was said to have been required for the purchase of corn for daily consumption and for the completion of the mortgage deeds in question.

In the one case the only contesting defendant was a subsequent transferee Inayat Ilahi and in the other Maharaj Singh, one of the members of the mortgagor's family, also contested the suit. The other defendants did not put in any appearance. On behalf of the contesting defendants the execution of the documents as well as the passing of consideration were denied. It was further pleaded that there had been no legal necessity for the transfers, and that the mortgage deeds were therefore not binding on the family.

The learned subordinate Judge was of opinion that it was not open to Inayat Ilahi, he being a transferee only, to raise such a plea, and he further held that the other contesting defendant Maharaj Singh, not having been born at the time when the two prior mortgage deeds were executed, was not competent to challenge the transactions. He accordingly decreed both the suits in full.

Inayat Ilahi and some of the defendants, other than Maharaj Singh, have preferred two appeals and on their behalf, although the findings as to the execution and the passing of considerations are not challenged, it has been strongly contended that there was in fact no legal necessity for these transfers.

The first question which arises is as to whether it is open to the transferee Inayat Ilahi to raise the question of want of legal necessity. This question we would have thought depended on the further question whether a mortgage of joint property by a Hindu father without any legal necessity and not in lieu of any antecedent debt and without the consent, express or implied of the other members of the family, was void or only voidable. If such a transfer were void there can be no doubt whatsoever that any subsequent transferee who comes into possession of the property would be entitled to raise the point that the transaction was not binding on the property.

On the other hand if the mortgage transaction were merely voidable at the option of the non-contesting members of the family, then it is difficult to see how a subsequent transferee of the property itself could be allowed to question it. A transaction which is voidable remains good so long as it is not challenged by the members who have the option to have it set aside. It is for them to exercise or not to exercise the option. If without exercising that option and in fact admitting the validity of the mortgage they transfer the property, the transferee cannot be allowed to say that he has acquired that option by the transfer.

Undoubtedly it has been held in number of cases that a transfer by a Hindu widow, who represents the whole estate for the time being and who certainly has power to transfer the property for her life-time, is only voidable at the option of the reversioners and not absolutely void. But as to a Hindu father, the whole estate does not vest exclusively in him but in the family of which he is the head. He may also, as the manager, be the agent of the family in relation to the outside world. The question whether a transfer by him without legal necessity is void or voidable is another matter. There are certainly observations in some old cases which go to show that such a transfer is not absolutely void but only voidable. In the case of Hanuman Kamat v. Honuman Mandur (1) their Lordships of the Privy Council observed at p. 126 that the sale by a Hindu father "was not necessarily void but only voidable if objection were taken to it by the other members of the joint family."

And the same view was expressed by a single judge of this Court in the case of Bishamber Dayal v. Parshadi Lal (2). On the other hand, the learned advocate for the appellants relies on the observations in the cases reported in 15 All. 339 and 33 All. 783 where it was distinctly held that such a transfer without the consent of the other members of the family was "invalid".

Their Lordships in the leading case of Sahu Ramchandra v. Bhup Singh (3) at page 442 observed "any deed of gift, sale or mortgage granted by one coparcener on his own account of, or, over, the joint family property is invalid ; the estate is wholly unaffected by it and its entirety remains free of it". It may be that the word "invalid" is not necessarily the same thing as void. We do not however think it necessary to go any further into this question as we feel ourselves bound by the ruling of the Full Bench in Muhammad Muzamullah Khan v. Mithu Lal (4) which laid down that it is open to a subsequent transferee, to take the plea that the prior mortgage was without legal necessity.

The question still remains how far the present transferee Inayet Ilahi is bound by his undertaking to pay off the prior debts. In the sale deed which was executed on the 6th January 1919 in his favour it was admitted by the vendors in the clearest terms that the prior debts contracted by their ancestors were binding on them. They purported to transfer only the equity of redemption (i. e. property subject to those mortgages) and actually left in deposit with the vendee the whole sum due in order that the same may be paid to the representatives of the prior mortgagees. Having undertaken to pay off these debts the vendee now turns round and says that he is not bound to pay them, though his sale deed contains a very clear admission on behalf of all the members of the family who were parties to it that the prior mortgage debts had been incurred for legal necessity and were binding on the family.

It is to be noted that 12 years have not yet expired since the execution of the sale deed. The vendee's title as against the whole family therefore rests on this document alone that is to say he must admit that it is under this document that he has acquired the property from the whole family. This in our opinion means that the persons who executed the document in his favour were acting on behalf of the whole family. It follows therefore that the admission contained in this document must so far as the vendee is concerned, be taken to be an admission made on behalf of the whole family ; and that admission is that the prior mortgage deeds were binding on the family.

And therefore even though it is true that such an admission cannot operate as an estoppel against the defendant inasmuch as there was no privity of contract between the mortgagees and him, and further because the plaintiffs' position has in no way been compromised, there can be no doubt that this admission is a very strong piece of evidence in favour of the view that the transactions must have been for valid necessity otherwise they would not have been accepted as such by all the members.

Coming to the facts we find that the dealings really go back to a very early period. The earliest document that was executed was dated the 22nd January 1873 by Hardeo the grandfather of the present mortgagors in favour of one Ajit Singh for a sum of Rs. 98/- the whole of which had been paid in cash. It is true that this amount being secured on the family property cannot be treated as an antecedent debt in the strict sense of the term. But it having been borrowed as early as 1873 and evidence as to the actual necessity having disappeared, subsequent admission of its validity would be a very strong piece of evidence to be considered. This deed was followed by a mortgage deed of the 19th May 1873 by the same mortgagor in favour of the same person for a further sum of Rs. 200/-the whole of which was either acknoweledged to have been received before hand or was paid in cash before the sub-registrar. The third document was of the 26th January 1874 for a sum of Rs. 250/- out of which Rs. 113-8 were given credit for on account of the amount due on the first-mentioned document and Rs. 136/8 were received in cash. The 4th mortgage was for a sum of Rs. 400/- under which Rs. 229/- were paid off on account of the amount due under the deed of the 19th May 1873 and a sum of Rs. 171/- was received in cash. There is a recital in this document that this sum of Rs. 171/- was required for the purpose of paying Government revenue for the June instalment and for meeting certain personal expenses.

The 5th document was dated the 5th January 1875 for a sum of Rs. 400/- under which the earlier document of the 26th January 1874 was paid off and a further sum of Rs. 118/- was advanced. Then we have the document of the 5th August 1875 under which the 4th and 5th mortgage-deeds were paid off and the balance was received in cash. All these transactions are transactions entered into by Hardeo the grandfather of the mortgagors as early as the seventies.

On the 31st January 1887 a mortgage by conditional sale for a sum Rs. 3,100/- was executed in favour of the same mortgagee Ajit Singh under which he was put in possession of the mortgaged properties and the amount due on the earlier document of the 5th August 1875 was paid off. There is a further recital in this document that Rs. 505-7-3 were due on account of a Munsif's Court decree and Rs. 64-8-9 were due on account of prior debts. Rs. 150/- were paid in cash. There can be no doubt that this mortgage by conditional sale was fully acted upon and the mortgagee entered into possession soon after. He and his representative have been in possession of the property since then, which means that during the whole of a period of over thirty years the mortgagors' family has allowed this property to remain out of its possession.

On the 16th June 1894 another mortgage-deed was executed by Durga Prasad, Munna Lal and Bhawani Prasad, the sons of Hardeo, in favour of one Mt. Lachmi Bai for a sum of Rs. 6,400/-. Under this document Rs. 6,100, were left with the mortgagee to pay off the mortgage by conditional sale the validity of which was of course accepted and Rs. 300/- were acknowledged to have been received in cash. There can be no doubt that subsequently Mst. Lachmi Bai the mortgagee paid off the prior mortgage and entered into possession of the property in place of the previous mortgagee. On the 1st of March 1897 another mortgage deed by the same 3 persons was executed for a sum of Rs. 900/- and the recital is to the effect that the money was required to pay off a decree for arrears of rent held by Chaudhri Sunder Singh and another and to meet certain personal expenses. The property hypothecated under this bond was the same as covered by the mortgage by conditional sale.

Up to the year 1914 no attempt was made by any member of the mortgagor's family to challenge any of these mortgage deeds or to recover the property from the possession of the mortgagees. The family seems to have acquiesced in these transfers. A third party would therefore be quite justified in presuming that the debts must have been incurred for family necessity. On the 2nd June 1914 six members of the family, namely, Bhawani Prasad acting in his own right and as guardian of his sons Bansi Dhar and Raghubar Singh (2) Gaya Prasad, (3) Kalka Prasad for self and as guardian of his minor son Sarup Singh, (4) Murlidhar, (5) Sheo Narain for self and as guardian of his minor sons Sughar Singh, Babu Ram and Chute Tua and (6) Sanet Singh in his own right and as guardian of Maharaj Singh executed the documents in suit under which the amounts due under the previous mortgage deeds of 1894 and 1897 mentioned above were left with the mortgagees to be paid off and the balance of Rs. 500/- was said to have been required for purchasing corn for daily consumption and meeting the expenses of the execution and the registration of the deeds.

It was some years after these mortgage deeds that Inayet Ilahi obtained a sale-deed on the 6th January 1919 in which there was a fresh admission on behalf of the mortgagors that the two mortgage debts in question had been validly incurred and were binding on the family.

It is true that in a case where a mortgagee wishes to enforce a charge against the family property the burden lies on him to satisfy the Court that the mortgage transaction had been entered into for family necessity or in lieu of antecedent debt or with the consent, express or implied, of all the members of the family. In the present case we are of opinion that this burden has been sufficiently discharged. In the first place, the transactions extend back to the year 1873 and for all this long period there never has been any protest made by any member of the family. Further more there is nothing to show that in the years 1894 and 1897 there were any major members of the family alive who were not parties to the transaction and whose consent ought to have been obtained and was not obtained. In fact the ages of the various defendants as given in the plaint would rather go to show that all of them or at least most of them were not even born in those years. A long series of renewals of mortgage transactions extending for over a generation without any protest by any member of the family would show its acquiescence and raise a fair presumption that if there had not been a valid necessity for them some objection would have been raised. The present mortgagees were not the mortgagees in the years 1894 & 1897, and so it is not a matter within their special means of knowledge as to whether the amounts borrowed on these dates had been incurred for legal necessity. In view of the long continued acquiescence of all the members of the family, at any rate by all the adult members of the family, and the express admission contained in the sale-deed of 6th January 1919, we are of opinion that it must be held that in this case the burden of proof of legal necessity has been completely discharged. It is not now possible after the lapse of so many years to produce evidence to show for what purpose the money was borrowed or how it was actually spent by the mortgagors. All that the mortgagees are required to show is that like ordinary men they were reasonably satisfied that legal necessity must have existed. In view of the conduct of all the members of the family in allowing the property to remain out of their possession for such a long time we think that this must be taken to have been so. Even though all these sums were borrowed on the security of the family property and although there is no direct evidence to show the actual necessity to meet which all the sums were borrowed, we are of opinion that the burden of proving the existence of legal necessity must be held to have been discharged. It was to pay of these debts and in that way to recover the property from the mortgagees, that the mortgage deeds in suit were executed. The family cannot now be allowed to retain the benefit and repudiate the liability.

We think it right to note that in the Court below with the exception of the transferee, only one defendant, Maharaj Singh, contested one of the suits. All the other defendants did not put in any appearance nor filed any written statement. The question of want of legal necessity was a mixed question of law and fact and none of these defendants ever attempted to raise it. None of them went into the witness box to explain away their own admissions. The plaintiffs produced some oral evidence also, which under the circumstances we do not propose to discuss. After the decrees in the two suits were passed Maharaj Singh the only defendant who was a member of the family submitted to the decrees and has not appealed. The persons who now appeal are the transferees, Sh. Inayet Ilahi and certain other defendants who did not put in an appearance in the Court below and who did not raise the question at all. Their reluctance to submit themselves to cross-examination suggests to some extent that they did not feel confident that they would be able to explain their previous admissions. The evidence of Jhau Lal and Hardeo Sahai is to the effect that Rs. 500 were taken to meet private expenses and the expenses of registration. The recital in the deed is to the same effect. The defendants have given no oral evidence to rebut it. Their own evidence would at least have shown for what purpose Rs. 500 were required. Neither the transferee nor these other defendants who never contested the claim can therefore succeed The result is that both these appeals fail and are hereby dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

L. P. A. No. 173 of 1921, D/-21st June 1923, from the judgment of Wallach, J., D/- 9th August, 1921.

Execution – Successive applications for execution when and to what extent barred.

There is nothing to prevent several applications being made, directed against and linked into partnership of private property. There is nothing to prevent a succession of applications directed against persons who are ascertained to be, or believed to be, partners in the particular venture out of which the decree has arisen. The limitation however that is imposed on all these applications is that, if there has been a previous application, in which there has been a definite decision affecting a particular piece of property, or a particular person, and from that decision nothing has been done by way of appeal or institution of suit if either of these methods were available, that decision is a final decision between the parties, and if in any subsequent proceedings, the point again becomes material the parties are bound by that previous decision, and the matter cannot be reopened. To that extent, and that extent only, is there limitation on the successive applications in execution.[P. 37 C. 1]

A. P. Dube—for Appellants.

L. M. Banerjee—for Respondent.

Mears, C. J.—On the 9th of April 1915 a firm, Bhairon Prasad and Mahadeo, borrowed Rs. 2500/-on a promissory note, the money having been lent by one Gajadhar. On the next day the firm borrowed a similar amount from another firm and both these notes subsequently were purchased by Kanhaiya Lal, the respondent in this matter. On the 10th of August 1916 Kanhaiya Lal brought a suit for the recovery of the Rs. 5000/- and interest. On the 28th of November 1916 the suit was compromised by one Mangli Prasad. At that date Mangli Prasad had a younger brother Phul Chand and a still younger brother, by name Suraj Karan, who was a minor. Mangli Prasad, purporting to act as a member of the firm agreed in writing to pay Rs. 6,120 in certain instalments, assented to the insertion of the usual default clauses, in the compromise and set aside certain immoveable property which he declared to be hypothecated to the due discharge of this debt. In the document of compromise he stated that Phul Chand and Suraj Karan were his brothers, and he spoke of them as joint owners with himself in the property specified at the foot of the deed, and also as members of the firm. That compromise was embodied in a decree of the 20th of November 1916. Kanhaiya Lal no doubt was confident that he had got a decree which, if default were made, could readily be put into execution. Default was made and on the 30th of July the respondents applied for execution. On the 8th of August they asked for an injunction restraining the transfer of or creation of charges over this property, and on the 18th of August this property was attached. On the 8th of September and again on the 12th of September Phul Chand for himself and his younger brother filed two applications. The first application was to set aside the decree. The second application was to at aside the attachment on the ground that the property sought to be attached, and which was the subject of hypothecation in the compromise decree, was wholly and entirely the property of Phul Chand and Suraj Karan, and the firm had no concern with it at all and that they, the two younger brothers were separate fr m Mangli Prasad. Objections were lodged by the respondent on November 3rd, and 10th, and amongst these objections the present respondent stated that it was not necessary in the suit to disclose the names of all the persons who were the partners. He further stated that Mangli Prasad had acted throughout as karta of the joint Hindu family, that he and his two brothers were joint that the business was the business of the family, and the property comprised in the compromise decree was also property of the joint family. The grounds of the application of the 12th of September alleged, as we have stated, a separation by Phul Chand and Suraj Karan from Mangli Prasad, it gave no date of that separation, and no particulars other than the assertion that as the result of that separation Mangli Prasad had been given a block of property elsewhere as his share whilst they had got other property comprising inter alia the property sought to be taken in execution.

It appears from the very scanty record that lies before us, that the learned Subordinate Judge apparently grouped the two applications of the 8th and 12th of September together. We have studied with great care, and with the assistance of Mr. Dube and Mr. Lalit Mohan Banerji, the order that he passed, because it is agreed that, if it should transpire that he in fact decided as a relevant matter that which at a later stage (in May 1919) the learned Subordinate Judge was again asked to decide, the decision of Mr. Justice Walsh, to which we will refer later, will be the decision to be preferred.

The exact text of the order sheet is to be found at page 931 [Phulchand v. Kanhaiya Lal (1)].

The order sheet of the 6th of September 1918 runs as follows:—"The decree holder has obtained a simple money decree against defendant No. 1, that i. e., firm Bhairon Prasad and Mahadeo. The present objectors were not parties to the decree. Mangli Prasad appeared for the firm. These objectors are brothers of Mangli Prasad. They were never disclosed in the plaint as partners. The property attached has not been proved to be the property of the firm. Under the circumstances attached property must be the property of the objector as well as that of the judgment debtor Mangli Prasad representing the firm. Ordered 2/3rd share in the property attached to be released; parties to bear their own costs".

Now it is necessary to consider what the parties were contending for. Kanhaiya Lal, the decree holder, wanted the attachment of property which under the compromise decree had been hypothecated by the eldest of the three brothers on the assertion that it was property which belonged to the firm and that the three brothers constituted a joint family. The order of the Judge involves first of all a finding by him that the status of the family had undergone a change. He evidently accepted the story of Phul Chand and Suraj Karan that there had been a separation. He appears to have believed whatever evidence was put before him and that their status had altered from that of joint tenants to tenants-in-common, because he treated this property, not as the objector wished it to be treated, as belonging wholly to them, but treated it on the basis that each brother had an equal one-third share. He must have decided that the two younger brothers were not partners in the firm, and he also decided clearly that it was not proved that the property, though represented by Mangli Prasad to be the property of the firm, was in truth the property of the firm. It is on those findings, erroneous as they may have been, that the order of 6th September 1918 was based, and its propriety cannot be challenged now. The decree holder, dissatisfied as he may well have been, did not appeal from that order, nor did he under Order 21 rule 63 make this question, as to whether the property comprised in the compromise decree belonged to the firm or not, a matter for a suit. It is said that the decree-holder could not have appealed; but we are by no means satisfied with that. We cannot decide that matter because it is conceded that he certainly had a right to proceed under Order 21 rule 63. Instead of taking a course in which there would have been regular pleadings and definitely formulated issues, he, on the 14th of September, applied to the Judge for review and submitted to the Judge that the order of the 6th of September was an erroneous one and asked for a reconsideration of the matter.

The learned Subordinate Judge is said to have taken no steps in this matter until the 3rd of May 1919, on which day he passed an order saying that he had already decided that the objectors were not parties to the decree, and the property not proved to be the property of the firm, that there was no new ground disclosed for a review, and that there was no mistake apparent on the face of the record. On these grounds he dismissed the ex-parte application. Thereupon, two days later, the decree holder made an application asking that the liability of the opposite parties might be determined, and that leave might be given to execute the decree against them. On the 23rd of June 1920 the Subordinate Judge disposed of that application, holding that the order of the 6th of September 1918 did not operate as a bar to this application, and that it might be entered upon and decided. He went into the evidence on either side and made an order favourable to Kanhaiya Lal, the present respondent. The objectors appealed to this Court and the matter was considered, by Mr. Justice Walsh and Mr. Justice Wallach on 9th August 1921. There was a difference of opinion between them, Mr. Justice Walsh coming to the conclusion that the order of the 6th of September 1918 had involved issues on which decisions had been given and that by the application of the 5th of May 1919 the respondents were seeking to reopen questions which had become final. Mr. Justice Wallach was of opinion that the order of the 6th of September 1918 did not exclude an application under Order 21 rule 50 (2).

It is in these circumstances that the matter has come up before us, and the question for our determination is: ought the Subordinate Judge to have entertained the application of the 5th of May 1919; or ought he, without going into the evidence on the merits, to have held himself precluded by virtue of the previous struggle between the parties which was concluded by the order of 6th September 1918.

We are of opinion that the judgment of Mr. Justice Walsh is to be preferred, for these reasons. The position of the respondent when he first sought to obtain execution was as follows. He could have limited his execution to the partnership property, relying upon the fact that service had been duly effected upon Mangli Prasad, a partner. He might also have proceeded personally against Mangli Prasad. So that he had a dual remedy by the mere fact of service on Mangli Prasad, that is a remedy against the whole of the property of the partnership; and a remedy against the personal property and person of Mangli Prasad. Because of the form of the compromise decree the respondent naturally sought the property therein pointed out and he proceeded under Order 21 rule 50 (1); and we regard his application as being limited exclusively to property which he believed, on the representations of Mangli Prasad, to be partnership property, certain of being attached. When in reply to the attachment of the 18th of August Phul Chand and Suraj Karan filed applications, the Judge before allowing execution had to be satisfied that the property sought to be attached was the property of the partnership. Having regard to the form which the applications of the 8th and 12th of September took and the form of the objections of November 3rd and 10th by the plaintiff, it would appear that incidentally but nevertheless necessary to the determination of this question whether the property was the property of the partnership, was the question of the status of the family and the membership of the firm, and the Judge by the terms of his order sheet and by the statement made by him when dismissing the application for review does undoubtedly show that he dealt with all those three matters.

As regards the order of the 6th of September 1918, as we have already said, nobody in either Court has had a good word to say for it. It appears to us to be erroneous; but the decision may have been a right one, inasmuch as it must have been dependent upon evidence produced before the Subordinate Judge, which is not before us. The respondent complains that, by that erroneous order of the 6th of September 1918, he has been grievously injured, and that having paid money for the promissory notes which formed the basis of the action, and having obtained a compromise into which no other business man would have entered, has been by trickery and process of law deprived of this recourse against what he still undoubtedly believes to be partnership property, and property of a joint Hindu family. Mr. Justice Walsh in his judgment took the line that the respondent was himself largely to blame for this and we feel there is some force in that observation, because it was unwise of him, having got what he considered to be plainly a perverse decision of the 6th of September, to apply for a review to the same Judge. His proper course, if he took the view that the order of the 6th of September was not appealable, was to institute a suit and have the matter carefully and properly thrashed out. He did not do that, and such issues as can fairly be presumed to have necessarily been before the Subordinate Judge and to have been decided by him, have been finally decided, whether such issues were rightly or wrongly decided. That was the position on the 9th of May, and we have already said that we are of opinion that on that day the learned Subordinate Judge in going into the matter on the application under Order 21 rule 50 (2), was going over, as regards some of the issues, the same ground which the previous Judge had decided.

It is quite true, as the respondent has pressed upon us, that successive steps may be taken in execution; that is to say there is nothing to prevent several applications being made, directed against and linked into partnership of private property. There is nothing to prevent a succession of applications directed againt persons who are ascertained to be, or believed to be, partners in the particular venture out of which the decree has arisen. The limitation however that is imposed on all these applications is that, if there has been a previous application, in which there has been a definite decision affecting a particular piece of property, or particular person, and from that decision nothing has been done by way of appeal or institution of suit, if either of these methods were available, that decision is a final decision between the parties; and if in any subsequent proceedings, the point again becomes material the parties are bound by that previous decision, and the matter cannot be reopened. To that extent, and that extent only, is there limitation on the successive applications in execution. We think that the objection which was taken to the learned Subordinate Judge going into this matter on the 9th of May, which was that he was going to cover as regards material matters points which had been discussed and settled finally between the parties in September 1918, was a right objection, and he ought not to have entertained the application of May 9th.

The sesult therefore is that we set aside the order of this Court and also the order of the Court below, and in lieu thereof we dismiss the application presented by the respondent Kanhaiya Lal under Order 21 rule 50 (2). Under the circumstances we leave the parties to bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

Hindu Law — Debts—Son suing to set aside alienation by father—Necessity to be proved by defendant transferee.

In every case the burden prima facie lies on the plaintiff to establish his case; but where it is either admitted or proved that the plaintiff was a member of a joint Hindu family, that the property transferred was an ancestral property, and that it had been transferred without the plaintiff's consent and not apparently in lieu of antecedent debt or at an auction sale, the burden would lie on the defendant transferee to justify the alienation. Judgment.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal arising out of a suit for setting aside three sale-deeds two of which were executed on the 4th of December 1921 and the third on the 30th of July 1913 by the fathers and grandfathers of the present plaintiffs on the ground that these alienations of ancestral property were without any legal necessity. There was no suggestion in the plaint that the debts had been contracted for any illegal or immoral purposes.

The defendants transferees contested the claim mainly on the ground that the debts had been incurred for family necessities and were binding on the plaintiffs. It was also pleaded that the claim was barred by time inasmuch as the plaintiffs were not born at the time of the first transfers.

The Court below found that the plaintiff No. 1 was alive at the time when the transfers of 1901 took place and that the two remaining plaintiffs were born before the execution of the third sale-deed. It accordingly held that the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the suit. It however dismissed the suit on the ground that the burden lay on the plaintiffs to prove that the transactions were without any legal necessity and inasmuch as the plaintiffs had failed to discharge that burden the claim stood dismissed. It relied mainly on two authorities, namely, the case reported in A. W. N. (1887) 116 and a judgment of the Patna High Court reported in 54 I. C. 946.

The plaintiffs have come up in appeal to this Court and on their behalf it is strongly contended that the burden of proof was wrongly laid on them.

Both the cases referred to by the learned Subordinate Judge were cases in which the mortgagees were suing to enforce their mortgage and were therefore not parallel cases. In the first of these two cases all that Sir John Edge, C. J. remarked was that where a son comes into Court to ask relief against a sale effected by his father for an antecedent debt it would be for the son to make out a case for the relief asked.

In the Patna case however at p. 948 there is an observation by Sultan Ahmad J. to the effect that Courts have always drawn a distinction between a case where the property has passed out of the hands of the family by mortgage, sale or other alienation by the father, and the son sues for the recovery of the same and the case where the mortgagee seeks to enforce the mortgage executed by the father against the sons who are in possession of the property. In the former case the son must show the grounds on which he seeks to set aside the alienation by the father. In the latter it is the mortgagee who has to show how he claims for the repayment of the debt of the father.

If the learned Judge intended to lay down a general proposition of law that in every case where a Hindu son brings a suit to recover possession of properties from transferees the burden lies on him to prove that the transfer was without any legal necessity then we would be inclined not to agree with that view. Of course, in every case the burden prima facie lies on the plaintiff to establish his case; but where it is either admitted or proved that the plaintiff was a member of a joint Hindu family, that the property transferred was an ancestral property, that it had been transferred without the plaintiff's consent and not apparently in lieu of any antecedent debt or at an auction sale, the burden would lie on the defendant transferee to justify the alienation.

It is however not necessary for us to remand the case, for both the parties produced all the evidence which they intended to produce and no evidence has been shut out. We therefore propose to consider the case on its merits.

The dealings between the parties go back to a very early period. On the 15th July 1876 a possessory mortgage for Rs. 299 was executed by Ram Yad Rai and others, the recital in the deed being to the effect that the money was borrowed for the payment of Government revenue and for household expenses. This was followed by a second possessory mortgage-deed dated 29th May 1885 for Rs. 99-15-0 by Ram Lagan and Kodai Ram grandfathers of the present plaintiffs in which the necessity for the loan was recited to be the marriage expenses of a daughter, the payment of Government revenue and certain household expenses. About a year or two afterwards a simple money bond for Rs. 98 was executed by Ram Lagan under which no family property was hypothecated. This was followed by a hypothecation bond for Rs. 237 dated 30th July 1887 which was executed in order to pay off the previous simple money bond and also to pay Government revenue and household expenses. After this, on the 5th of April 1888, a fresh hypothecation bond was executed for Rs. 199 out of which Rs. 94-0-6 were set off against an amount due under account books and the balance of Rs. 104-15-6 was said to have been required for the purpose of paying Government Revenue, household expenses and the purchase of bullocks. In the same year another hypothecation bond of the 19th July 1888 for Rs. 299 was executed under which Rs. 100 were set off against parole debts incurred in connection with some marriage and Rs. 35 for payment of Government revenue, and Rs. 164 for Gevernment revenue and household expenses.

In the next year, on the 11th April 1889, another hypothecation bond was executed under which the three previous documents of the 5th April 1888, 19th July 1888 and 30th July 1887 were discharged. No fresh sum was advanced under these documents. In the year 1890, namely, on the 27th February 1890, a hypothecation bond for Rs. 450 was executed by the same persons the recital being that the money was required for paying Government revenue and to meet certain necessary expenses. On the 4th September 1898 a simple money bond for Rs. 99-15-0 was executed under which no family property was hypothecated and the recital was to the effect that the money was required for payment of Government revenue. On the same date and for the same purpose another simple money bond for the sum of Rs. 99-15-0 was also executed.

Such was the indebtedness of the family. Part of the family property had been alienated long before 1901 under possessory mortgage deeds, and there can be no question that the mortgagees were in possession of the property. Up to the year 1901 there is no suggestion that any member of the family ever raised any protest or objection to these transfers. It was professedly with a view to recover the properties from these mortgagees that in 1901 two sale deeds which are the subject matter of the dispute in this case were executed. The first one was executed for Rs. 3,718-0-0 by Ram Lagan Rai and Kodai Rai the grandfathers of the present plaintiffs. The recitals contained in the deed clearly show that the amount due under the document dated the 11th April 1889 as well as on two other possessory mortgage deeds, the dates of which are not mentioned in the deed but under which the family property in mauza Newa had been transferred, were paid off. We have already indicated that the mortgage deed of the 11th April 1889 had been executed in order to pay off the previous documents of 1887 and 1888. One of the two mortgages referred to in this deed was probably the possessory mortgage deed of the 15th July 1876 and the other was deed of some later date which has not been produced in this case. We however have this fact that both these mortgage deeds were actually redeemed by the present defendants, as is borne out conclusively by the endorsement on the back of the document of 1876 as well as an application dated 22nd June 1915. It was by raising the money in this way that the family was able to redeem the property from the possession of the mortgagees who had remained in possession for some 20 years at least without any protest on behalf of the other members of the family. The family thus benefited considerably,

The second sale deed of the same date was executed for a sum of Rs. 1499 which was raised in order to discharge the hypothecation bond dated the 27th February 1890 and two unregistered simple bonds dated 4th September 1898. So far as these two latter documents are concerned the amount due on them was obviously an antecedent debt which the family was bound to pay and to discharge which the grandfathers of the present plaintiffs were entitled to transfer a part of the family property.

The first mentioned hypothecation bond, namely, that of the 27th February 1890 had been executed for Rs. 450 and the recital contained in the document shows that the money was required for the purpose of paying arrears of Government revenue and meeting certain necessary expenses. This is a recital contained in a very old document of the year 1890 and there is really no ground for supposing that the recital contained in this old document was wrong. The evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs is absolutely nil; on the other hand we have the statement of the defendant Gokul Rai which proves that at the time when this deed was executed he had made thorough enquiries and was fully satisfied that the amount was required for the payment of Government revenue which was due and for meeting other family expenses. Under these circumstances, we see no reason to believe that the recital contained in this document was in any way wrong.

The 3rd sale deed is dated the 30th July 1913 and was executed by Kodai Rai and Hanuman Rai and Ramgobind Rai sons of Ram Logan Rai as well as Lalta Rai another member of the family. On the face of the document the sale consideration was the amount due under 5 unregistered documents. All these documents have been produced on behalf of the defendants and there can be no question that these were genuine documents and that the sums had been advanced on them. From the documents it is evident that the money was advanced not on the security of the family property. The amounts due under them therefore constituted, antecedent debts the payment of which was binding on the family. The third sale deed therefore cannot in any way be now questioned by the plaintiffs. We have already said that there is no suggestion put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs that these debts were in any way tainted with any illegality or immorality.

Even though therefore the burden lay on the defendants transferees to justify the alienations, we are of opinion that the circumstances of this case as well as the documentary and oral evidence on the record are sufficient to discharge this burden.

On behalf of the plaintiffs only Baijnath Rai, plaintiff No. 1, was examined who had no personal knowledge of the transactions entered into by the family. All that he stated was that he was not aware of the execution of the various mortgage deeds and that he had made some enquiry from other persons, not the members of his family, and understood that the debts had been contracted without any purpose and were spent extravagantly. On the other hand there is the statement of Gokul Rai to the effect that he had made enquiries and was satisfied that necessity existed for the loans. Gokul Rai had zemindari property along with the plaintiffs' family in the same villages and may be expected to be acquainted with the financial position of the plaintiffs' family. The various documents produced show clearly that the family was in great need of money and was regularly borrowing small sums of money for meeting ordinary household expenses and for paying arrears of Government Revenue. Even at the present time the plaintiff No. 1 has admitted that there are at least 18 persons, including women and children, in his family, and the entire profits of his estate come to Rs. 300 or Rs. 350 a year only. The transactions between the parties go back to a very early period. Evidence of the various ways in which the amounts borrowed were spent has practically disappeared and in the circumstances we are of opinion that the evidence which the defendants have been able to produce is quite sufficient; we therefore hold that the defendants have discharged the burden of proving that these were good transfers. The result is that the decree of the lower Court must be upheld. The appeal is dismissed accordingly including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

F. A. No. 305 of 1921, D/-3rd July, 1923 from the decree of the 2nd, Sub. J., Cawnpore, D/-25th June, 1921.

Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 4 (2)—Claims by strangers to property can be gone into by Civil Courts.

Under the new Act if a question of title has been actually raised by a stranger to the insolvency and decided by the Insolvency Court the decision is final, and the question cannot be re-opened in a separate regular suit. This however does not mean that exclusive jurisdiction has been conferred on the Insolvency Court, and that the only remedy open to the aggrieved stranger is to apply to that Court. Where a person has made no attempt to bring the matter up before the Insolvency Court and there is no order of the Insolvency Court which can be pointed out as amounting to a decision within the meaning of sub-clause (2) of S. 4, he is at perfect liberty to have recourse to the ordinary Civil Courts. [P. 42 C. 2]

(b) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 68—'May' does not mean 'must'—Jurisdiction of Civil Court not barred.

The word "May" in S. 68 does not mean "Must" S. 68 provides a speedy remedy to which recourse can be had if the person aggrieved chooses to seek it. But it is not the only remedy open to him. It is open to a third person who does not claim title through the insolvent to treat the receiver as a trespasser and maintain his claim in a Civil Court. [P. 43 C. 1]

(c) Provincial Insolvency Act (1920), S. 28 (2)—Leave—Insolvency Court.

There is no statutory provision under which leave is necessary to file a suit against official receiver. On the other hand whatever provision there is in the Act relating to the grant of such leave is confined to claims of creditors. Reference may be made to S. 28 sub-cl. 2. [P. 43 C. 1]

The utmost that can be said is that an official Receiver is a public Officer within S. 2 subclause 17 (d) C. P. C., and notice under S. 80 is necessary before filing a suit against him, [P. 43 C. 2]

A receiver appointed under the Code of Civil Procedure merely holds the estate on behalf of the Court. The estate does not vest in him, nor does he in any way represent it. Leave of the Court is necessary in order that by impleading him the estate may be bound. A receiver under the Insolvency Act holds a different capacity altogether. He is more than a mere officer of the Court. Under S. 28 (2) the insolvent's estate vests in him. He alone, and no one else, represents the estate. He therefore is the proper party to be impleaded in the action. No leave is accordingly necessary for suing him. [P. 43 C. 2

(f) Hindu Law—Property in wife's name—Presumption.

There is no presumption that property standing in the name of a Hindu widow, even though purchased in her name, belongs to her husband. [P. 44 C. 2]

B. E. O'Conor and Ramnama Prasad—for Appellant.

K. N. Katju—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for a declaration that she is the owner in possession of a certain house situated in the city of Cawnpore; and that the insolvent defendant No. 2 had no concern with it, and it is not liable to be attached by the official receiver. The house in question was purchased on the 29th of May 1914 under a registered sale-deed in the name of the plaintiff. Some years afterwards in 1919 Chhote Lal defendant, the plaintiff's, husband, entered into a partnership with one Ram Dutt—a commission agency business-which ultimately failed in 1920. On the petition of certain creditors the firm was adjudicated an insolvent, and the official receiver took charge of the insolvent's estate. On the 6th of November 1920 he attached the house in question as property belonging to the insolvent Chhote Lal. The report of the receiver says that the present plaintiff protested and stated that the house belonged to her parents.

It is important to note that she made no attempt to seek redress in the insolvency Court, but filed this regular suit for declaration on the 21st of February 1921.

The official receiver who mainly contestd the suit pleaded that the house belonged to the insolvent and not to the plaintiff. It was further urged that the plaintiff not having raised any objection at the time of the attachment was estopped from suing; that her only remedy was to file objections in the insolvency Court within 21 days of the attachment and civil Court had no jurisdiction to try this case, and lastly that the permission of the insolvency Court was necessary before the institution of the suit.

Tho insolvent, as might be expected in either view of the matter, supported the plaintiff's claim.

The learned Subordinate Judge decided the three legal issues in favour of the plaintiff, but on the question of fact came to the conclusion that the house in dispute belonged to Chhote Lal and not to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff has come up in appeal to this Court and on her behalf the finding of fact arrived at by the Court below is challenged. The learned Advocate for the defendant-respondent has not only supported the decree on the finding of fact, but also on the legal pleas decided against him.

As the questions of law come first in logical sequence I propose to dispose of them first.

The plea of estoppel raised in the Court below has not been pressed at all, and it may be said at once that there was manifestly no substance in it.

The points which have been very strongly pressed in appeal are (1) that under the new Provincial Insolvency Act No. 5 of 1920 exclusive jurisdiction is conferred on Insolvency Courts with the result that no regular suit on the civil side is maintainable as against the official receiver and (2) that in any case no such suit without the permission of the Insolvency Court can lie.

The argument is that an official receiver under the Insolvency Act is an officer of the Court, that therefore the act complained of must be deemed to be an act of the Court and the person aggrieved thereby should have recourse to that Court and to no other tribunal. But the present plaintiff not claiming title through the insolvent was a stranger to the proceeding and was in no way represented therein. It is difficult to see how her rights can in any way be prejudiced by an act done by the receiver in spite of her protest. It is suggested that the policy of the Act is to expedite matters and not to permit claims to be brought after a number of years, and it is argued that it was with this object in mind that S. 4 was enacted which in effect means that the question should forthwith be disposed of finally by the Insolvency Court.

In my opinion S. 4 of the Act is an enabling section and confers full power on the Insolvency Court to decide all questions of title or priority or of any nature whatsoever which arise before it, or which it may deem necessary to decide. Sub-clause 2 makes "such" decision final and binding for all purposes on all claimants against him. In reality S. 5 gives to the Insolvency Court the powers of a Civil Court.

It is to be noted that prior to the passing of this Act there was a conflict of opinion between this Court and the Calcutta High Court, the view prevailing in the latter Court being that questions of title could be disposed of by a regular suit only. Obviously the enactment of S. 4 gives effect to the view which prevailed in this Court. I accept the contention of Dr. Katju that under the new Act if a question of title has been actually raised by a stranger to the insolvency and decided by the Insolvency Court the decision is final and the question cannot be re-opened in a separate regular suit.

This however does not mean that exclusive jurisdiction has been conferred on the Insolvency Court, and that the only remedy open to the aggrieved stranger is to apply to that Court. In my opinion where a person has made no attempt to bring the matter up before the Insolvency Court and there is no order of the Insolvency Court which can be pointed out as amounting to a decision within the meaning of sub-clause (2) of S. 4, he is at perfect liberty to have recourse to the ordinary Civil Courts. In the present case the plaintiff never appeared before the Insolvency Court nor put her case before it, nor was any evidence led nor any adjudication of her rights made. How then can it be said that there is a "decision" against her which precludes her from suing? The act of attachment was an act of the receiver and not necessarily an act of the Court, much less was it a "decision" by the Court.

The act of the receiver may be compared to the act of the Civil Court amin who wrongly attaches the property of a third person in execution of a decree. Such an act is done as much under the authority of the execution Court as the act of a receiver under that of the Insolvency Court. No special sanctity attaches to the acts of the receivers under the Act. It is true that in certain particulars and subject to certain conditions the decision of the Court is final and absolute against third parties also and in that way the proceeding differs from proceedings in execution where the order disallowing the objection is not final. But in other respects the similarity certainly exists. In the absence of "such" decision the Civil Court remedy is not barred.

Reliance was also placed on S. 68 of the Act which says that if the insolvent or any of the creditors or any other person is aggrieved by any act or decision of the receiver, he may apply to the Court, and the Court may confirm, reverse or modify the act or decision complained of, and make such order as it thinks just. It is strongly contended that the word "May" in the section should be read as "Must" and that therefore the only remedy open to the aggrieved person is by way of an application under this section. In my judgment this contention is untenable. S. 68 provides a speedy remedy to which recourse can be had if the person aggrieved chooses to seek it. It is not the only remedy open to him. Of course if a person applied under that section he would be subject to the time limit prescribed therein. But if he wanted to enforce his claim in a Civil Court under S. 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure his rights would be those of an ordinary person. I am of opinion that it is open to a third person who does not claim title through the insolvent, to treat the receiver as a trespasser and maintain his claim in a Civil Court. There is no provision in the Act other than that contained in S. 4 which in any way takes away the jurisdiction of a Civil Court to try such a suit.

In the case of Bhairon Prasad v. S.P.C. Das (1) which came under the old Act, the opinion was expressed that a stranger to the insolvency may at his option seek his redress in the ordinary Civil Court. The effect of S. 4 of the new Act has in no way been to alter the law so far as this point is concerned.

The next point urged is that before instituting the suit it was necessary to obtain the leave of the Insolvency Court. It is conceded that there is no statutory provision under which such leave is necessary. On the other hand it may be pointed out that whatever provision there is in the Act relating to the grant of such leave is confined to claims of creditors. Reference may be made to S. 28 sub-clause 2 which provides that no creditor to whom the insolvent is indebted shall commence any suit or other legal proceeding except with the leave of the Court and on such terms as the Court may impose. If leave were necessary in all suits, this provision would be altogether superfluous. I may also point out that under S. 28 (6) the power of a secured creditor to realise or otherwise deal with his security remains unaffected. Much less can then the rights of a stranger who claims an independent title be prejudiced. The utmost that can be said is that an Official Receiver is a public officer within the meaning of S. 2 sub-clause 17 (d) of the Civil Procedure Code, and that notice under S. 80 is necessary. In the present case it is not disputed that such notice was sent before the institution of the suit.

It is however very strongly urged that on general principles it should be held that an official receiver is merely an officer of the Court and that no suit can be maintained against him unless the leave of the Court which appointed him has first been obtained. Reliance has been placed on some cases of the Bombay, Madras, Calcutta and Patna High Courts in support of this contention. None of the cases cited however are cases arising out of insolvency proceedings. A receiver appointed under the Code of Civil Procedure merely holds the estate on behalf of the Court. The estate does not vest in him, nor does he in any way represent it. Leave of the Court is necessary in order that by impleading him the estate may be bound. Without leave of the Court he represents nobody; after leave he represents the real beneficiary. A receiver under the Insolvency Act holds a different capacity altogether. He is more than a mere officer of the Court. Under S. 28 (2) the insolvent's estate vests in him. He alone, and no one else, represents the estate. He therefore is the proper party to be impleaded in the action. No leave is accordingly necessary for suing him.

(1) [1919] 17 A.L.J. 787—51 I.C. 113.

It should also not be overlooked that there is a distinction between the case where the plaintiff suing the receiver had been represented in the previous proceeding and where he was not represented. For instance a creditor in an insolvency proceeding, a share-holder in the liquidation proceedings of a Company or a party to a litigation is represented in the proceeding when a receiver of the property is appointed. In cases of this kind it may be that a party to that proceeding having himself submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court cannot subsequently challenge it, and start a fresh proceeding against the receiver appointed in that litigation without having first obtained the leave of that Court. The position may however be quite different where a person who was a stranger to the proceeding in which the receiver was appointed wants to sue the receiver.

In certain Acts an express provision is made that no suit shall be instituted against an officer appointed by the Court; for instance S. 171 of Act VII of 1913 so provides. It is conceded that there is no such provision in the present Act. And independently of a statutory provision I can find no rule of law under which a suit against a Receiver in insolvency can be thrown out on the mere ground that no leave of the Insolvency Court had been obtained. This disposes of the questions of law raised in the appeal.

Coming to the merits of the case I can say without hesitation that it is impossible to uphold the finding of the Court below. The learned Subordinate Judge recorded a finding that the property in dispute belonged to Chhote Lal and not to the plaintiff. The question whether the plaintiff has succeeded in proving that the property belongs to her I shall consider presently. But there can be no question that there is no evidence whatsoever on the record to support the finding that the property in dispute belonged to Chhote Lal. Undoubtedly as the plaintiff came to Court asking for a declaration of title, the burden lay on her to establish a prima facie case that the property belonged to her. But after she had proved that the title deeds stood in her name, that her name was entered in the Municipal registers and she had been paying the Municipal rates and taxes and had been assessed as owner, and that for all practical purposes she was the ostensible owner of the property, then if the defendant wanted to prove that she was a mere benamidar the burden shifted on to him to show that the purchase money had been found by her husband. I wholly disagree with the view expressed by the Court below that there is a presumption that property standing in the name of a Hindu widow, even though purchased in her name, belongs to her husband.

In this case as I have already remarked the sale-deed of the 29th of May 1914 stood in her name. There had been a number of previous transfers which need not be mentioned except the mortgage deed dated the 13th of May 1913 executed by Kali Charan and Mst. Alpi, the previous owners, in favour of Dip Chand and Shimbhu Dat for a sum of Rs. 900/-. When the sale-deed of 1914 was executed the amount due under this document was left in the hands of the vendee for payment to the previous mortgagees. Shimbhu Dat one of the mortgagees was an attesting witness to the sale-deed and he also admittedly received the mortgage money after the sale had been executed.

The plaintiff has produced a building permit dated the 5th of May 1918, which shows that an application for making some new erections was made by her to the Municipal Board and permission was granted on that date. There are also receipts for payment of water and house taxes standing in the plaintiff's name. At the time when the receiver went to attach this house the plaintiff admittedly was occupying a part of the house, the other portion being let out to certain tenants. These circumstances in themselves make out a sufficient prima facie case in favour of the plaintiff. In addition to these pieces of documentary evidence, the plaintiff produced a number of witnesses in support of her claim. She herself went into the witness-box and stated that the house had been purchased by her father and uncle some seven years ago. Then she said that the money was paid by her father and the sale transaction was carried out by Mathura Prasad. In a later portion of her statement she said that the money was given to the vendee by Mathura Prasad. In paragraph 1 of the plaint she had alleged that the house was purchased by her father with his own money. One of the points pressed on behalf of the contesting defendant is that there is a gross inconsistency in these statememts. In my opinion there is no inconsistency or contradiction whatsoever. It is an admitted fact that the plaintiff's father and uncle were members of a joint family. The plaintiff's mother died when she was an infant and she was brought up in the house of her father and uncle. If the property was purchased with the money belonging to the family the money may be said to have belonged to either of the two or to both. She next stated that on account of some quarrel with the relations of her husband she had to leave her husband's house, and this was why her father and uncle thought of getting a house for her.

Her father was dead when the suit was brought. Her uncle Mathura Prasad went into the witness-box and swore that he had provided the money for the purchase of this house. Mathura Prasad owns some zemindari property, he also carries on some business, and is a lambardar in one of the villages. He stated that he had Rs. 1000/- in the village and brought the amount to the city for payment to the vendee. It is true that he said that there were no account books kept by him and that he was not in a position to produce any documentary evidence to prove the payment. He produced two witnesses Mahadeo and Hanuman to show that he actually brought the money from the village. It is unnecessary to comment on the evidence of these witnesses who are men of no status. But there is the evidence of Babu Chhote Lal, Vakil, a distant relation of the plaintiff, to the effect that before the sale-deed in question was executed Mathura Prasad had gone to him and shown him some papers relating to the house and consulted him. His evidence certainly shows that Mathura Prasad was in some way or other connected with the transaction. Two witnesses Gaya Din and Raghunath were examined to prove that the rents were paid to the lady by them, and that the house taxes were also paid by the plaintiff. The evidence on behalf of the defendant receiver is practically nil. No circumstances are shown which would make it at all probable that Chhote Lal was the real purchaser and that the property had been obtained fictitiously in the name of the plaintiff. For instance it is not shown that in the year 1914 Chhote Lal had any motive to enter into a benami transaction or that he was contemplating the starting of any business and it was with a view to cheat the future creidtors that the property was purchased in the name of his wife. In fact it was many years after the sale that he entered into the parnership business which failed. The oral evidence produced by the defendant consists of three persons Gur Dayal, Kanhaiya Lal and Jhabu Lal whose statements are mainly to the effect that Chhote Lal was in a position to advance Rs. 1000/- towards the acquisition of this house. They also tried to prove that Chhote Lal after the sale-deed was executed made some statements alleging himself to be the real owner. Such a statement even if true is of no value against the plaintiff. Gur Dayal is a general attorney of one of the petitioning creditors. The sale-deed was not executed in his presence nor is he able to say where the purchase money came from. Kanhaiya Lal is himself a creditor. In the presence of neither of these the sale transaction took place. In my opinion therefore the evidence adduced by the defendant is wholly insufficient to overweigh that adduced by the plaintiff. The documentary evidence is entirely in favour of the plaintiff and there are no circumstances which in any way throw any suspicion on the transaction. The burden which lay on the plaintiff of establishing a prima facie case was sufficiently discharged by her evidence and no rebutting evidence worth the name has been adduced on behalf of the defendant. In this view of the matter the finding of the learned Judge must be overruled. I would therefore allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and decree the plaintiff's suit with costs.

Lindsay, J.—I agree with my learned colleague that this appeal should be allowed. There are no merits in the case of the respondent. I wish however to say a few words regarding the legal points which have been raised in the case. The questions which arise for decision are simple questions of the interpretation of Act V of 1920 and it does not appear to me necessary to resort to any previous decision or authority for the purpose of construing the relevant sections.

So far as S. 68 is concerned it cannot in my opinion be maintained on the language of that section that a person who is aggrieved by any act of a receiver is under an obligation to apply to the Court for relief. What the section says is that such a person "may apply" to the Court and it is further provided that if he exercises his option of applying to the Court he must make an application within 21 days from the date of the act complained of. On the face of it the language of the section is permissive, not mandatory. The person aggrieved has the choice either of applying to the Court or of seeking his ordinary remedy under the Civil law.

It is argued that because of the provisions of S. 4 of Act V of 1920, whereby jurisdiction has been conferred upon insolvency Courts to determine questions of title arising in insolvency cases, it must necessarily follow that any person who has a question of title to raise must apply to the insolvency Court; in other words it must be assumed from the provisions of S. 4 that because these powers of deciding questions of title have been conferred upon insolvency Courts therefore the insolvency Court has exclusive jurisdiction. That appears to me to be a deduction which cannot be made from the language of S. 4. All that the section intended to provid was that if a question involving title is raised before an insolvency Court then the insolvency Court is to be deemed to have power to decide that question of title. It must not be taken to subscribe to the view that has been expressed by my learned colleague regarding what follows if an aggrieved person does elect to make an application to the insolvency Court. I am not prepared to take the view that a decision under sub-section (2) of S. 4 would be binding upon a stranger, like the plaintiff in the present case, who in my opinion is not making any claim against the debtor or the debtor's estate. What the plaintiff in the present suit is saying is that the property about which the dispute exists does not belong to the debtor's estate and never did belong to it and so I cannot see how it can be said that she in the present proceedings is claiming against the debtor or his estate. That question, however, does not arise for decision and these observations are consequently obiter. I have only made them in order that I may not be supposed to hold the opinion that a decision under Sub. S. 2 is binding upon all parties including parties who are entire strangers to the insolvency proceedings.

It being settled therefore that the plaintiff in the present case had the ordinary Civil remedy which was open under the law, the further question arises why she should be bound in any way to solicit the sanction of the insolvency Court before she brought the suit against the official receiver. There is no statutory provision for such sanction being asked or given and on principle I fail to see why any such authority is required. The official receiver may be an officer of the Court, but no special sanctity attaches to his office when he is brought in contact with a person who is an entire stranger to the proceedings in the insolvency Court. I can well understand the position that so far as the insolvency proceedings are concerned the receiver or official receiver stands in a peculiar relation to all parties who are interested in the proceedings, that is to say, the insolvent himself or the creditors or other persons who are seeking satisfaction out of his estate. But he has no particular status as against parties who are entire strangers to the proceedings in the insolvency Court and if under colour of his office as receiver or official receiver he commits an act of trespass it is difficult to understand on what principle the person against whom the trespass is committed is under any obligation to ask permission of the insolvency Court to bring an action against the receiver. The remedy of the person complaining is the ordinary remedy at law and no question therefore of any sanction arises. It may of course be that in cases where the defendant has an official status notice of the suit must be given to him as required by the Civil Procedure Code. In the present case I understand that such notice was necessary and was actually given.

It is admitted as I have said that there is no statutory authority for the proposition that a person who is suing a receiver or official receiver appointed under the Insolvency Act has to obtain the permission of the insolvency Court. There have been no doubt numerous cases in which it has been laid down that proceedings against a receiver should not be taken without the leave of the Court. Where a receiver has been appointed in the course of a suit it seems reasonable enough that all parties to that suit should be bound by the order appointing him and consequently, being subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, should not be allowed to question the acts of a receiver without the Court's permission. But there is in my opinion no authority for the proposition that, where in a suit a receiver has been appointed, no person who is a stranger to the suit can question an act of the receiver without the sanction of the Court. That seems to be an absolutely untenable proposition and opposed to all principle. In the present case I am satisfied (1) that the plaintiff was under no obligation to seek any relief in the insolvency Court; (2) that she had the ordinary remedy under the Civil law against the official receiver; and (3) that for the purpose of maintaining the suit she was under no obligation to seek any sanction from the insolvency Court.

By the Court.—The order of the Court is that the appeal is allowed, the decree of the Court below is set aside and the plaintiff's suit is decreed with costs in both Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for redemption of a usufructuary mortgage of some shops executed in 1843 by the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claim that the principal and interest had been more than paid up by the usufruct. Various defences were raised in the suit, but it is now only necessary to consider two points. The trial Court held that the plaintiffs must pay Rs. 1099/-0/-9 plus interest at 9 per cent. per annum to the defendants for necessary repairs made by them in the premises they held, under the terms of the mortgage deed. It further held that Chhammu Lal and Ram Narain who had obtained possession of two of the shops had made certain improvements in their shops which had cost them about Rs. 109 each, and directed the plaintiffs to pay this amount to Chammu Lal and Ram Narain with interest at 9 per cent. per annum. On appeal the lower appellate Court held that the defendants were not entitled to interest on the sum of Rs. 1099 spent by them in repairs, on the ground that they had already received increased rent in consequence of these repairs which was equivalent to interest. It seems to us that this really is a finding of fact.

On the second point it held that there was no evidence to show that Ram Narain had made any improvements at all, and therefore, nothing was due to him; and as regards Chhammu Lal it found, that what he had done was to put in some iron bars into a window in order to suit a particular tenant; and that he had received increased rent accordingly. In any case it seems to us that improvements of this kind do not fall within S. 72 of the Transfer of Property Act; and in this respect we agree with the concluding remarks in Rupan Singh v. Champa Lal (1). The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs including fees in this Court on the higher scale.

Mahomedan Law—Pre-emption — Mortgagee in possession not a Co-sharer.

Although for certain fiscal purposes a mortgagee in possession is treated under the Land Revenue Act as a co-sharer he cannot be deemed a co-sharer for the purpose of pre-emption. [P. 48 C. 2]

B. K. Mukerji—for Appellants.

E. A. Howard—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The Court of first instance had decreed the plaintiff's suit, but on appeal after some further evidence had been taken the learned District Judge dismissed it. His findings are that the plaintiff and the vendor are co-sharers in the same mahal in which the property in dispute is situated and that a custom of pre-emption exists in the village. There is a further finding that the defendant vendee is recorded as a mortgagee in possession of some share in the same mahal. On this latter finding the learned District Judge was of opinion that the defendant himself was a co-sharer and that therefore the plaintiff had no preference over him. The entry as to the custom of pre-emption in the wajib-ul-arz is as follows :—

Every owner of a patti will have the right of transferring his share in the property first in favour of bhai haqiqi ek jaddi (own brothers descended from a common ancestor) and in case of their refusal to other co-sharers in the village.

It seems to us that even after having made a mortgage of his share a co-sharer would have a proprietary interest left in him so as to entitle him to bring a suit for pre-emption. In the same way the mere fact that a person has taken a possessory mortgage of a share in the village would not give him proprietary interest in it. If the true interpretation of the wajib-ul-arz were that a mortgagee in possession was to be deemed a sharik deh then the result would be that the right of pre-emption would be defeated by making a mortgage on one day followed by a sale to the mortgagee the next day. It is true that for certain fiscal purposes a mortgagee in possession is treated under the Land Revenue Act as a co-sharer but we are of opinion that he cannot be treated as a proprietor of the village. Under the Muhammedan law there can be no doubt that it is only a person having an absolute interest in the property who has the right of pre-emption. The entry in the wajib-ul-arz does not show that a mortgagee is to be deemed a co-sharer for the purpose of pre-emption. In this view of the matter we think that the defendant mortgagee could not resist the claim for pre-emption on the ground that he was himself a person entitled to an equal right with the plaintiff. We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

In support of the alleged custom the defendant examined some 33 witnesses. Thirty of these spoke of the general custom permitting the adoption of a daughter's son prevailing among the Agarwala Vaishas and they were able to cite at least 34 witnesses out of which 20 instances were accepted as being instances where adoption either of a daughter's son or a sister's son had taken place. Out of these 20 instances 11 were instances of the adoption of a daughter's son.

Judgment.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for recovery of possession of a house and some landed property with mesne profits. The plaintiff who is one of the daughters of Kesrimal deceased, alleged that on the death of Kesrimal his estate was inherited by his widow Musammat Sohani who died on the 6th of May 1918, and that the plaintiff being the poorer of the two daughters was entitled to inherit the estate in preference to Musammat Sunder, the mother of Ram Krishna the principal defendant. On behalf of the defendant it was pleaded that he had been adopted by Kesrimal in his lifetime some 24 years ago and that there was a custom prevailing among the Agarwala Vaishas to adopt a daughter's son, and further that the present claim was barred by time.

Both the Courts below have found that the adoption did in fact take place and have also accepted the defendant's evidence as establishing the existence of the alleged custom. The plaintiff comes here in second appeal and urges that the evidence adduced to prove the custom permitting such adoption is legally insufficient.

In support of the custom the defendant had relied on contracts of wajib-ul-arzes relating to some 13 villages in which a general custom to adopt a daughter's son or a sister's son was recited, but there was no specific reference to Agarwala Vaishas in them. That evidence has not been relied on by either of the Courts below. In addition to this there were three judgments. In the first one the custom was found not to have been established. In the second one the trial Court found that the custom had been proved but on appeal the High Court decided the case on another ground. In the third and the last case the learned additional Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur in an elaborate judgment found that the custom had been fully established. He cited 45 instances which had been proved in that case. In the present case the defendant examined some 33 witnesses. Thirty of these spoke of the general custom permitting the adoption of a daughter's son prevailing among the Agarwala Vaishas and they were able to cite at least 34 instances out of which 20 instances have been accepted by the Courts below as being instances where adoption either of a daughter's son or a sister's son had taken place. Out of these 20 instances 11 are instances of the adoption of a daughter's son.

Both the Courts below have accepted this evidence and are of opinion that it satisfactorily establishes the custom set up by the defendant. We in second appeal are unable to hold that this evidence was legally insufficient to prove the custom or that the Courts below were not justified in accepting it.

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Gokul Prasad, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants arising out of suit brought by some Managers of the Ram Lila Committee for a declaration of a right of easement and for the demolition of certain building erected by defendant No. 2 with the permission of defendant No. 1 on a plot of land No. 607. The plaintiffs also claimed an injunction.

The point raised by the plaintiffs was that the Hindus of Karhal used to hold Bharatmilap and in order to get to plot Nos. 604 and 606 they used to pass over plot No. 607 and that because of that user they had acquired a right of easement of passage over plot No. 607.

The contention of the defendant was that Bharatmilap processions after passing over the public road passed over plot No. 608 and from that to the Chabutra in No. 604. The defendants did not contest the plaintiff's right to celebrate the Bharatmilap on plot No. 604 or 606, what they said was that the plaintiffs or their predecessors had not acquired any right of easement over plot No. 607 but that there was already a passage which they could use for the procession.

The suit has been decreed by both the Courts below. The defendants come here in second appeal. The dispute in this suit was a very small one i. e. about the passage of the Bharatmilap and we thought that this was eminently a case which should be settled amicably and we gave the parties time for the purpose. Although several adjournments were obtained nothing was done and we have therefore to decide the appeal on the merits. As regards plot No. 607 over which the plaintiffs respondents assert a right of way for the passage of the Bharatmilap the finding of the lower appellate Court is that the way of the Bharatmilap procession lay through plot No. 607. This was not the case of either of the parties and it is tantamount to a denial of the right of passage over plot No. 607 claimed by the plaintiffs. It has also been found that when the procession first passed over defendant's land it was with the permission of the defendant. No question of any right of easement can therefore arise; the user, if any, was permissive. Therefore the plaintiff's claim on the ground of easement, customary or otherwise, fails and on this ground the claim should have been dismissed. The defendant No. 1 Shrimati Rameshari Debi is the Zamindar of the plots and the plaintiffs have, in our opinion, failed to prove any right in them to limit her user of plot No. 607. The suit ought to have been, strictly speaking, one on behalf of the Hindu community. The Courts below have allowed the plaintiffs to proceed as if the suit had been one of that nature. We do not think it necessary to enter into that question. Mr. Baleshwari Parsad the learned vakil for the defendants appellants has however stated to us that his client, the Zamindar, is willing to give the plaintiffs a fifteen feet wide passage over plot No. 608 for going from plot No. 609, the public road, to 604 and 606. This we think is very reasonable offer and the plaintiffs would have done well to have accepted it. However as the defendant Zamindar is still willing to make that concession in favour of the plaintiff's we allow this appeal in part and discharge the decrees of the lower Courts. We make the above reservation in plaintiff's favour. In other respects we dismiss the plaintiffs' suit and we make no order as to costs. Appeal allowed

Hindu Law—Arbitration by father as manager—Reversioner has no power to challenge voidable deed not challenged by full owner.

[P 51 C 1,2]

N. Upadhia—for Appellants.

P. L. Banerji—for Respondents.

Daniels, J.—This case has been referred to a Bench because the precise point has not been previously decided. The question is whether the reversioner has a right to challenge an alienation made by the father as manager of a joint Hindu family which the son, who had a right to challenge it, did not challenge during the father's lifetime. The facts are these. Mahabir Pende and his minor son Bansgopal constituted a joint Hindu family. Mahabir Pande, on 2nd February 1917 made a gift of the suit property to his wife Musammat Ramraji. The deed of gift purported to constitute her full owner of the property. Mahabir died shortly after making the gift. Bansgopal died in November 1917. On 3rd May 1920, Mt. Ramraji executed a deed of conditional sale in favour of the defendant for a sum of Rs. 316. The plaintiffs who are the next reversioners sue, on the assumption that Mt. Ramraji held only the estate of a Hindu widow or a Hindu mother, for a declaration that the deed of conditional sale is not binding on him after Mt. Ramraji's death.

The question therefore is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to challenge the deed of gift. If Mt. Ramraji had a good title under the deed of gift she was entitled to deal with the property as she liked. If the plaintiffs can claim the same right as Bansgopal had to challenge the gift, then the defendant will have to justify it on the ground of legal necessity. It has been found by the Court below that there was legal necessity to the extent of Rs. 259 out of Rs. 316, but both the Courts below have dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiffs are not entitled to challenge the deed. With this finding we agree. No authority for the right claimed by the plaintiffs has been shown to us either in the Hindu texts or in the decided cases. There is ample authority for the view that an alienation by the manager of a joint Hindu family without necessity is not absolutely void. It is voidable at the instance of the persons whose interests are affected by it, namely, the co-parceners in the property. This has been held in two recent Madras cases Subba Goundan v. Krishnamachari (1) and Sankara Variar v. T. K. Ummer (2). The point was of importance, as on it depended whether the persons setting aside the alienation were entitled to mesne profits from the date of the alienation, or only from the date of repudiation. There is authority of this Court to the same effect in Sheo Ghulam v. Badri Narain Lal (3).

The interests of the plaintiffs were in no way affected by the deed of gift when it took place. They had no right in the property whatever during the lifetime of either Mahabir or his son. It would be giving a great and unwarranted extension to the rights of reversioners as hitherto understood to allow them the right to challenge alienation under the circumstances

N. C. Vaish—for Appellant.

K. C. Mital—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a defendant vendee's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The defendant had denied the existence of any custom and the Court of first instance dismissed the suit. On appeal the learned District Judge set aside the decree of the first Court and decreed the suit, holding that the custom of pre-emption alleged by the plaintiff had been established.

The evidence as to the existence of the custom produced by the plaintiff consists of an entry in the wajib-ul-arz of 1870 as well as decrees of the years 1885 and 1916. As against that the defendant relied on the judgment and decree of the year 1913.

An entry as to the right of pre emption recorded in a wajib-ul-arz is certainly good prima facie evidence of the existence of the custom unless there is internal evidence in the wajib-ul-arz itself or some other evidence or circumstance to rebut it. In the present case although it appears that there was an earlier wajib-ul-arz of 1860 in existence none was filed. We have only the entry in the wajib-ul-arz of 1870 which in the early portion of it does contain an express statement as to the existence of a right of pre-emption in favour of bhai haqiqi and then qaribi, then pattidars and then co-sharers in other pattis as against strangers. The clause in the wajib-ul-arz containing this recital however contains a large number of other matters over a dozen in number.

It has been contended very strongly on behalf of the defendant appellant that reading the clause as a whole this entry cannot be a record of custom. The test to be applied in such cases was laid down by the Special Bench in Fazal Husain v. Muhammad Sharif (1) where it was pointed out that if a wajib-ul-arz was of an unusual nature and in the very same clause in which reference was made to pre-emption, reference was also made to a number of other matters which could not possibly have been matters of custom the presumption would be rebutted. This case has been followed in a number of other cases, vide the case in Surajbali Singh v. Muhammad Nasir (2) where the right of one co-sharer to redeem a mortgage made by another co-sharer, was held not to be a possible record of custom.

In the present case it is not necessary for us to give in detail all the matters recited in the clause which may or may not be the record of custom. We need only to refer in particular to that portion of it which says that an issueless co-sharer shall have no right to make a gift of his property in favour of a person not entitled (gair mustahaq) and if such a transfer takes place then on the death of the co-sharer his legal heirs would be the owners of the property.

It is obvious that this is an unreasonable restraint on an owner's power of alienation, and even though intended for the benefit of his relations it cannot possibly be enforced in a Court of law. An entry, which lays down that a right exists which cannot be based on a custom having the force of law, it is valueless as evidence to prove such custom. This being so we are of opinion that the presumption which would ordinarily arise from an entry of a right of pre-emption in the wajib-ul-arz has in this case been sufficiently rebutted, and that there is internal evidence in the clause itself to show that the recitals contained therein are not all records of custom.

In addition to this wajib-ul-arz the plaintiff relied on a decree for pre-emption of the year 1885. It is however to be noted that the settlement of 1870 had not expired by that year and that the right of pre-emption, even if based on contract, was then enforceable. In that judgment the question of custom was neither raised nor decided. The decree of the year 1916 is a mere compromise decree. Although it is certainly evidence of an assertion of the right of pre-emption on the part of the co-sharers, it cannot be conclusive inasmuch as the question of the existence of any custom was not gone into by the Court and decided. As against this we have the Munsif's judgment of the year 1913 where the plaintiff's case that a custom existed had been found not to have been established. Our conclusion therefore is that in this case the plaintiff has failed to establish that there is a custom of pre-emption under which he is entitled to pre-empt the property. The result is that this appeal must be allowed. We accordingly set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

S, A. No. 1773 of 1921, Decided on 16th May, 1923 from the Dt. J., Ghazipur, D/13th June 1921.

Agra Tenancy Act S., 4—Land turned into grove.

As soon as the zemindar allows the grantee to convert the land into grove it would cease to be land held for agricultural purposes within the meaning of the definition. [P. 54 C. 1]

H. K. Mukherji—for Appellant.

Haribans Sahai—for Respondent.

Daniels, J:—This was a suit under S. 158 of the Tenancy Act for a declaration that the plaintiffs had acquired under-proprietary rights under that section on the ground that the land in suit had been held rent-free for over 50 years and by two successors of the original grantee. The suit has been decreed by both the Courts below. The land is admittedly covered by a grove and the contention of the appellant is that Chapter X of the Agra Tenancy Act in which S. 158 occurs does not apply to groves.

The land in suit is said to have been granted to the predecessor of the plaintiff under a written "danpatra" about 100 years ago. Both the Courts have found that the grant is genuine.

The terms of the grant are reproduced in paragraph 1 of the plaint. They give the grantee the right either to use the land for cultivation or to plant it with a grove. The grantee did in fact plant a grove on it. Both in the plaint and the written statement the land is described as grove, and the finding of the Court below is that the land is admittedly grove land and has been held as such from the time of the last revision of records, which was between 30 and 40 years ago.

Land as defined in S. 4 of the Tenancy Act is limited to land which is let or held for agricultural purposes, and it has been held in several decisions of this Court that this definition does not include areas occupied by groves. It is unnecessary to refer to the earlier decisions as the question has been finally set at rest by the Full Bench decision in Kesho Prasad Singh v. Sheo Pragash Ojha (1).

The learned District Judge gets out of this difficulty very summarily. He says that the land was not let to be turned into a grove but was let for agricultural purposes and therefore it is "land". It is difficult to see how the learned Judge could say this in face of the express terms of the title deed which is the basis of the plaintiff's claim and of the plaintiff's own admission in para 1 of the plaint. But even if it had been correct it would not dispose of the case. As soon as the zemindar allowed the grantee to convert the land into grove it would cease to be land held for agricultural purposes within the meaning of the definition. But assuming that we hold that on the pleadings and the plaintiff's title deed it was not open to the District Judge to come to this finding, the respondents are prepared to support the decree on the ground that the restricted definition of "land" contained in the present law was not to be found in the Rent Act of 1881. Uuder that Act "land" included groves. They rely on S. 30 of that Act and contend that they had acquired under-proprietary right under cl. (d) before the present Tenancy Act came into force. This is a new case put forward for the first time in second appeal and the answer to it is that in order to succeed under S. 30 (d) of the Rent Act of 1881 it was necessary for the plaintiffs to show that land had been held rent-free and by at least two successors to the original grantee for 50 years prior to the 22nd December, 1873. It has not been found by either Courts that this was the case and we have not been referred to any evidence on which such a finding could be based. We think therefore that the appeal must succeed and it is not necessary to go into the further point urged by the appellant that even on the finding of the Court below the land is not really held rent-free. It is no doubt shown in the papers as grove not assessed to rent (bila lagani) but it is also found by the Court below that according to the wajib-ul-arz all groves not assessed to rent pay half their produce to the proprietor. There is on the record a judgment of this Court in Civil Revision No. 31 of 1912 between the defendant and the father of the plaintiff upholding a decree in favour of the former for a claim to produce of the grove by way of rent.

We allow the appeal and setting aside the decree of the Court below dismiss the suit with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Iqbal Ahmed—for Appellant.

Damodar Das—for Respondents.

Piggott, J.--The three connected appeals before us arise out of one single suit. This was filed by Ruhul Amin, the appellant before us, as long ago as the 24th of March 1916. The object was to set aside a transfer purporting to have been effected by a sale deed of November 16, 1906, executed by various persons and amongst others by the mother of the plaintiff, who purported to act on behalf of the plaintiff, then a minor, as his natural guardian. There was a long array of defendants including numerous subsequent transferees of the property concerned. In the written statements of at least two of these defendants the point was taken that the plaintiff had attained majority prior to the institution of the suit, and that the plaint purporting to be signed and verified on his behalf by a next friend, namely the father's sister's son of the plaintiff, was not valid in law, and that there had been no valid presentation of the plaint. It is impossible for us to say why the trial Court ignored these pleadings at the time of the settlement of the issues. Both parties are to blame for not having insisted upon an issue being struck on a pleading of this nature which went to the very root of the case. The plaintiff in particular finding it alleged against him that the suit was not even lawfully before the Court, should have in our opinion taken prompt action. He could either have accepted the plea regarding his majority as true in fact and asked permission to present the plaint formally to the Court himself after making the trifling amendment which would have been necessary, or if he desired to stand by the allegation of his minority he should have asked for an issue on the point. In the result the trial Court went into the merits of the case and decreed a part only, though a substantial part, of the plaintiff's claim.

There were three appeals filed, one by the plaintiff himself, and one by each of two sets of defendants who were dissatisfied with the decision of the trial Court. The defendants who appealed again made it a ground of objection in the lower appellate Court that there had been no valid plaint presented to the trial Court, and that the whole of the proceedings of that Court were vitiated by this defect. The lower appellate Court entertained this plea. It went into the facts of the case, and it found that the plaintiff had actually been born in the year 1890, so that he was over 25 years of age when the plaint was filed on his behalf by his father's sister's son. The learned Additional District Judge upon this state of facts held that there was an incurable defect in the whole of the proceedings in the trial Court, that the decree of that Court in favour of the plaintiff was a bad decree. He dismissed the plaintiff's appeal, allowed the appeals filed by the two sets of defendants and dismissed the suit.

It is unnecessary to enquire whether the lower appellate Court could or could not have substituted for the decree of the trial Court an order returning the plaint to the plaintiff, to be presented again after proper amendment. There is some authority for the adoption of this course in a decision of the Madras High Court, which has been laid before us; but there is no decision of this High Court lending support to such a view of the law. If there was never any valid plaint before the Court, the proper order would seem to be one rejecting the petition tendered as a plaint and leaving it to the plaintiff to take such further action as he might think proper. In the present circumstances the question hardly arises, because by the time the learned Additional District Judge came to dispose of the appeals before him the period of limitation, even reckoned from the date given in the plaint, had expired.

The suit having thus been dismissed the plaintiff filed three appeals in this Court which were disposed of by a learned Judge of this Court in a single judgment. The learned Judge held that the question of law sought to be raised was concluded, so far as this Court is concerned, by the decision in the case of Sheorania v. Bharat Singh (1). He dismissed the appeals accordingly.

Various points have been raised in argument before us. The first was with reference to a later decision of this Court in the case of Basdeo v. John Smith (2). There are expressions in the judgment in that case which are inconsistent with some of the principles on which the decision in Sheorania v. Bharat Singh (1) appears to proceed; but the two cases are in their essence quite distinct. In Basdeo's case the learned Judges were at pains to point out that there was before the Court a plaint which had been validly presented by an Advocate of the Court, in whose favour there existed a clear presumption that he had authority to present the plaint. This being so, the only question was whether an alleged defect in the matter of signature or verification was or was not curable under the provisions of S. 578 of the then Code of Civil Procedure corresponding with S. 99 of the present Code. In the case before us the point taken against the plaintiff essentially was, and is, that his plaint had never been validly presented to the Court. That it had not been so presented seems obvious upon reference made to the provisions of Order 4 rule 1 and Order 3 rules 1 and 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A defect of this sort can scarcely be regarded as a defect in proceeding in a suit within the meaning of S. 99 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and in any case it is a plea which affects the jurisdiction of the Court. The trial Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit at all, except upon a plaint properly presented; and it ought to have gone into the question of the presentation of the plaint and determined it before it proceeded to try the suit.

(1) [1898] 20 All. 90—(1897) A.W.N. 203.
(2) [1899] 22 All. 55—(1899) A.W.N. 172 (F. B.)

The next substantial point argued before us is with reference to a petition, presented on behalf of the plaintiff to the trial Court, through counsel purporting to be duly authorised on his behalf. The date of the presentation of this petition appears to have been the 13th of November 1917, though it is stated as the 13th of April 1917 in the order under appeal. The petition was to the effect that the plaintiff, having now attained majority, desired to prosecute the suit in his own name, and asked the Court to pass the formal orders necessary to enable him to do so. It was within the knowledge of the trial Court that a certificate of guardianship had at one time been granted by the District Judge in favour of the plaintiff's mother in respect of the person and property of the plaintiff. One of the incidental difficulties in the case is that the plaintiff's age was grossly understated in the application on which this certificate of guardianship was ordered to issue. This however does not seem to have any essential bearing on the questions of law before us. What we are now taking note of is the fact that the issue of this certificate of guardianship had been brought to the notice of the trial Court. When therefore that Court received the plaintiff's application to be permitted to prosecute the suit as a major, it passed an order that the plaintiff should produce for the inspection of the Court the certificate of guardianship, or a certified copy of the same. The plaintiff took no further action and never produced the paper called for by the Court. The suit therefore went on to trial in the Court of first instance in a wholly irregular manner, without this important application on the part of the plaintiff having been formally disposed of either one way or the other. We are far from satisfied with the procedure followed by the learned Subordinate Judge who tried this suit in the first instance. But we are nonetheless satisfied that, a considerable degree of blame attaches to the plaintiff or to his legal adviser in that Court, for not prosecuting his own case with due diligence, and not obtaining proper orders from the trial Court upon essential points. Under the circumstances we do not think it possible to give the plaintiff any relief at this stage.

It has been suggested to us that the plaintiff's petition of the 13th of November 1917 might be treated as a presentation of the plaint on his behalf by counsel properly authorised by him. But we are of opinion that under the circumstances it would be stretching the law too far in the plaintiff's favour to take such a view of that proceeding. The presentation of that petition might have had an effect equivalent to a fresh presentation of the plaint, or might have led to some further proceeding or order on the part of the trial Court, which would have had that effect, if it had been properly followed up by the plaintiff. But as the case stands we are unable to take this view.

The result is that this and the connected appeals fail and we dismiss this appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

L. P. A. No. 11 of 1922 Decided on 8th June 1923 from the judgment of Stuart, J. D/-13th January 1922.

Co-sharers—Partition—Private partition is valid.

The co-sharers in a mahal have a right to effect a partition by private arrangement amongst themselves, and it may be the most convenient method of effecting such a partition to assign the entire holding of a particular tenant to a particular group of co-sharers. The only difference between a partition effected by private arrangement and one properly carried out under the orders of the Court is that the incidents of the private partition are difficult to prove, and that confusion and litigation may arise afterwards owing to the preparation of village records which are at variance with the actual facts. [P, 58 C. 3.]

M. L. Agarwala—for Appellants.

J. M. Banerjee and Haribans Sahai—for Respondents.

Piggott, J.—One Ram Naresh was the occupancy tenant of a certain holding. He mortgaged the same with possession to one Dukhit Misir, at a time when such mortgages were not forbidden by law. Dukhit accordingly entered into possession of the holding lawfully with the status of a mortgagee. Ram Naresh died in the year 1913. Dukhit remained for a time in possession as a tenant-at-will. His rights as mortgagee had been determined, because Ram Naresh had left no heir entitled to succeed to the tenancy. Dukhit has let into possession Har Prasad Rai and others who are co-sharers in the village, and we may take it as found that he has let them into possession in return for a money payment made in recognition of his rights as mortgagee. The plaintiffs came into Court alleging that they were the sole proprietors of the land which formed the occupancy holding of Ram Naresh. They claimed that Dukhit was their tenant-at-will, and that they were entitled to eject him under the ordinary procedure prescribed by the Local Tenancy Act, No. II of 1901. Along with Dukhit they claimed to eject Har Prasad Rai and others, who have been described as persons let into possession by Dukhit. In reply to the suit Dukhit said that he was no longer in possession, and had no longer any concern with the land, that he had been paid off by Har Prasad Rai and others, and that the plaintiffs might settle accounts with them. Har Prasad Rai and others pleaded that they were not merely co-sharers in the village, but co-sharers along with the plaintiffs in the proprietary rights over the particular land in suit. They claimed, therefore, that having induced Dukhit, no matter by what means, to surrender the land into their possession and occupation, they became entitled to hold the same as their khudkasht. In any event they contended that the plaintiffs had no right to sue them for an ejectment in a rent Court. The Assistant Collector who tried the case seems to have gone very carefully into the evidence and to have framed proper issues. There has been some controversy before us whether, on the pleadings of the two parties, S. 199 of the Tenancy Act did or did not apply; if it did apply, then the question of proprietary title was tried by the Assistant Collector, and there has been no contravention of the provisions of that section. The conclusion arrived at by the Assistant Collector was that, although according to the village records both the plaintiffs and the contesting defendants, Har Prasad Rai and others, held proprietary rights in respect of the land in suit, nevertheless there had been a private partition amongst the co-sharers, not carried out through the agency of a Revenue Court, and not recognised in the revenue papers, according to which private partition the plots of land in suit constituting the occupancy holding of Ram Naresh had been assigned wholly to the plaintiffs. On this finding principally, the Assistant Collector decreed the suit for ejectment. There was an appeal by Har Prasad Rai and his co-defendants to the Court of the District Judge. The District Judge, affirming the findings of the Assistant Collector, dismissed the appeal, On a second appeal being brought to this Court, a learned Judge of this Court has reversed the findings of both the Courts below, and has dismissed the suit. We are not quite clear as to the attitude of the learned Judge of this Court with regard to the finding of the lower appellate Court on the question of the separate title of the plaintiffs. He treats that finding as amounting to no more than this, that there had been an arrangement for convenience of collection amongst the various co-sharers of the mahal, by which the right to collect rent from Ram Naresh had been assigned to the plaintiffs alone. He clearly intends to hold that such an arrangement would not amount to a partition of the land amongst the various co-sharers, or to a surrender on the part of Har Prasad and others of their interests in the proprietary rights over the land in suit, in return for a similar surrender on the part of the plaintiffs of their interests in the proprietary rights over other lands forming part of the same mahal.

We do not think however that the finding of the learned District Judge can be interpreted in the way in which it has been in this Court. The finding itself is embodied in the words :—" I hold that under a private partition the plaintiffs respondents are the proprietors in exclusive possession of plot No. 879 and that they are entitled to eject the defendants appellants." Moreover, this finding is to be read in connection with the judgment as a whole, and also with the judgment of the Assistant Collector which was then under appeal. We think that both the trial Court and the lower appellate Court intended to find, and did find, that there had been a private partition of the mahal, by virtue of which the land in suit had been assigned exclusively to the plaintiffs.

It will hardly be contested that the co-sharers in a mahal have a right to effect a partition by private arrangement amongst themselves, and that it may be the most convenient method of effecting such a partition to assign the entire holding of a particular tenant to a particular group of co-sharers. The only difference between a partition effected by a private arrangement and one properly carried out under the orders of the Court is that the incidents of the private partition are difficult to prove, and that confusion and litigation may arise afterwards owing to the preparation of village records which are at variance with the actual facts. We cannot, however, in this case allow the clear finding of the lower appellate Court in favour of the plaintiffs on this question of partition to be disregarded.

The other point taken by the learned Judge of this Court is that in any event the defendants Har Prasad Rai and others are not tenants of the plaintiffs, and he seems to think that there was something dishonest in the procedure adopted by the plaintiffs in bringing the present suit, as a suit for ejectment of tenants, in the rent Court, instead of proceeding against Har Prasad Rai and others as rival claimants to the proprietary rights, by a corresponding suit instituted in a Court of Civil jurisdiction.

It seems to us at least doubtful whether, in the events of the plaintiffs having adopted the course suggested by the learned Judge of this Court, Har Prasad Rai and his co-defendants would not at once have taken shelter behind Dukhit and set up the plea that unless and until Dukhit's tenancy were extinguished no suit for ejectment would lie elsewhere than in the rent Court. At any rate, the position of the plaintiffs is in our opinion clear and maintainable on the facts alleged by them and found in their favour. Apart from the provisions of S. 34 of the Tenancy Act, when once the Court has found in favour of the exclusively proprietary title of the plaintiffs, there remains the fact, alleged in the pleadings and not seriously controverted, that Har Prasad Rai and his co-defendants were left into possession by Dukhit. Either they are transferees of whatever rights Dukhit possessed under his mortgage, in which case they are just as much the tenants-at-will of the plaintiffs as Dukhit himself was, or they are in the position of sub-tenants who have paid Dukhit a premium instead of an annual rent. This has been made still clearer by pleadings entered by Har Prasad Rai and his co-defendants in the 3rd paragraph of their written statement. We think the learned Judge of this Court was wrong and that he should not have interfered with the decision of the lower appellate Court. We set aside the decree of this Court and restore that of the lower appellate Court, allowing the plaintiffs their costs of both hearings in this Court, including fees on the higher scale.

When there was no proper nomination of a Mutwalli, a de facto mutwalli was allowed to take charge of the trust subject to any suit, by the person interested for his removal.]P 59 C 2]

S. N. Sen—for Appellant.

Mustaq Ahmad (for S. N. Sulaiman)—for Respondents.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—The question for consideration in this appeal is whether Sheikh Muiz-ud-din is entitled to obtain a refund of the money due to Bashir-ud-din, the late de facto mutwalli of the trust. It appears that a suit was filed by certain persons to dislodge Bashir-ud-din from the position of the mutwalli of the trust. That suit was decreed by the trial Court, and a Board of Trustees was appointed, to whom Bashir-ud-din was directed to pay certain trust money and costs. Subsequently that decree was set aside by this Court, which came to the conclusion that Bashir-ud-din had acted as a de facto mutwalli of the trust sufficiently long to be entitled to remain in possession of the trust property as such. By virtue of the decree of this Court Bashir-ud-din became entitled to claim a refund of the trust money and costs, which he had meanwhile paid to the judgment-debtors. A portion of the said money was realised by Bashir-ud-din in the life-time. An application was now made by his son, Muiz-ud-din, for the recovery of the balance. His allegation is that he was appointed by Bashir-ud-din, the late mutwalli, as his successor to the office, but the evidence adduced by him on that point was disbelieved by the Court below, and we are not prepared to differ from that view.

It appears, however, that on the death of Bashir-ud-din, Muiz-ud-din succeeded in getting mutation of names effected in his favour in respect of the trust property, and that he has since then been in possession of the trust property as the de facto mutwalli of the trust. In that capacity we think he is entitled to claim a refund of the monies, provided he agrees to credit the same to the trust and to duly account therefor to the person or persons who may hereafter be declared lawfully entitled to the mutwallishiip. It is urged on behalf of the judgment-debtors respondents that the payment of the money to Muiz-ud-din should be withheld, till the question of mutwallishiip is finally decided by a competent Court. The judgment-debtors cannot be allowed to hold back the trust moneys; but in the interest of the trust, we consider it advisable that we should not allow Muiz-ud-din to withdraw the money, which may be realized by execution, if the opposite party take steps within a reasonable period to get the question of the mutwallishiip to the trust adjudicated in a proper Court.

We allow the appeal accordingly and setting aside the order of the Court below, allow the execution to proceed subject to the condition that the money realized by execution or paid into Court shall remain in deposit until adequate security is filed to the satisfaction of the Court below for a refund of the same to the person entitled or for a period of 6 months in order to enable the judgment-debtors to contest the right of Muiz-ud-din to act as the lawful mutwalli of the trust in succession to his father Bashir-ud-din. If no suit is filed within the period to contest the validity of that office, Muiz-ud-din will be entitled to withdraw the money from Court without such security. If a suit is filed, the money shall remain in deposit till such security is filed or the question of the right of Muiz-ud-din to succeed to the office of mutwalli is determined in due course. The parties will, under the circumstances, bear their own costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

S. A. No. 100 of 1922, Decided on 5th July 1923, against the Dt. J., Ghazipur, D/- 17th September, 1921.

Pre-emption—Perpetual lease—Premium, almost equal to value, and small rent do not constitute sale.

Where a perpetual lease was sought to be pre-empted on the ground that the lease was in fact a sale.

Held: that the relation of the premium paid to the value of the property and smallness of the rent would not in themselves be sufficient to prove that the transaction was a sale and not a lease. 33 A. 104 Dist, 16 A. L. J. 333 Ref. [P 61 C 2]

M. L. Agarwala—for Appellant.

U. S. Bajpai—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit to pre-emt two transactions dated the 18th June 1919 and the 16th September, 1919 in the form of perpetual leases. It was conceded on behalf of the plaintiff that there was no custom of pre-emption with respect to leases but his case was that these transactions were in effect sale deeds in the garb of leases and were therefore liable to pre-emption.

On behalf of the defendant it was denied that these transactions were sale transactions. It may now be taken as undisputed that if these transactions were sale transactions then the defendants admit that they were liable to pre-emption,

Both the Courts below however came to the conclusion that these two transactions were sale transactions and not leases. They accordingly decreed the suit.

The defendant Bhairo Tewari has come up in appeal to this Court and on his behalf the finding referred to above is challenged.

Both these documents are similar in their nature and it will be quite sufficient for our purposes to consider any one of these.

The first one purports to be a perpetual lease of 5 bighas 5 biswas and 8 dhurs for a premium of Rs. 493/-, the rent reserved being Rs. 5/5/-. The lease goes on to provide that the lessee, generation after generation, shall be entitled to remain in possession of the leased property as pattadar and would have the right to have his name recorded in the revenue papers as tenant and perpetual pattadar; that he would be liable to pay the rent reserved year after year and instalment after instalment; in the event of the rent falling in arrears the lessor would have all the rights of an owner with respect to its realisation, but that there would be no right to have the lease cancelled, the rent enhanced or to eject the lessee.

According to the calculation made by the lower appellate Court the Government revenue came to about 12 annas per bigha and rent reserved at Re 1/- per bigha. It was on this calculation that the Courts below were of opinion that the rent reserved was a nominal one.

In our opinion it is impossible to construe these documents as sale deeds.

It is clear that the lessor and his representatives would, for all time to come, have the right to recover the rent reserved though it may be small. They would also under the law have the right of reversion in case the line of the lessees became extinct. As under the terms of this document the proprietary interest of the lessor has not ceased, there could possibly be no escheat to Government. The liability to pay Government revenue rests on the lessor, and it is difficult to see how he can escape it. It is inconceivable how at any future time it could be open to any of the representatives of the lessee to deny that the transaction was anything other than a lease or to refuse to pay rent. In spite of the direction as to non-enhancement of the rent, it is clear that if at the next settlement the Government revenue were to be increased the lessee would be bound under S. 49 of the Agra Tenancy Act to submit to an enhancement of the rent or to allow the lease to be avoided. So long as these rights are reserved to the lessor it is impossible to hold that this transaction is an out and out sale. It cannot be said that this document amounts to a deed of sale without also saying that the provision as to the payment of rent was unenforceable. But it is not permissible for the lessee to urge this as it will be tantamount to pleading an agreement in variation of the terms of the registered document which S. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act prohibits.

The learned Vakil for the plaintiff has strongly relied on the case of Lalji Misir v. Jaggu Tewari (1). The decision in that case however turned on the word "intiqal" which was held to be comprehensive enough to include leases. In the course of the judgment there was a remark that the transaction was in reality a sale. It is possible that the Court did not thereby mean anything more than that for all practical purposes it was a sale.

In the case of Muhammad Niaz Khan v. Muhammad Idrees Khan (2) the main consideration which influenced the judgment was that although the question had been raised in the pleadings, and there was a clear finding by the first Court that the disputed transaction was a sale, the lower appellate Court omitted to consider it. The case is really an authority for the view that a Court is bound on the issue being raised to consider the real nature of the transaction. We do not think that it could have been intended that the relation of the premium paid to the value of the property and the smallness of the rent would in themselves be sufficient to prove that the transaction was a sale and not a lease. In England pepper corn rents are well-known.

Of course, it is possible to conceive of a case where for instance, soon after the lease, there is a subsequent registered agreement giving up the right to recover rent or where the lease is followed by a surrender. The Court may then come to the conclusion that the two agreements were part and parcel of one and the same transaction, namely, a sale. There may also be cases where a sale is clothed in the garb of a usufructuary mortgage, the money advanced being equal to the value of the property and the terms such as to allow interest to go on accumulating so that year after year it becomes more and more impossible to redeem it. Then again there may ostensibly be deeds of gift, where consideration is paid privately. It is obvious that in all such cases the finding that the transaction amounted to a sale does not involve any variation of the terms of the registered contract.

The only ground on which the lower appellate Court has proceeded is the circumstance that a large premium has been paid and the rent reserved is very small. There are no other circumstances on which reliance has been placed. The inference drawn by the lower appellate Court that the document must be construed as a deed of sale cannot therefore be treated as a finding of fact.

Judgment.—In this case in the course of an application in execution to enforce a decree passed in terms of an award, the learned judge has gone into the merits, and finding on the evidence that a mistake had been made in the demarcation of a dividing line as shown upon a map which became a part of the decree, he has endeavoured to amend the mistake by giving effect to what he considers the real intention of the Arbitrators. It is quite clear that no execution Court has any jurisdiction to do anything of the kind. It may be that by an unfortunate chapter of accidents, the decree-holder has suffered loss by reason of the decree not in fact representing the true intention of the Arbitrators, and at first sight it may seen illogical for a Court of justice to refuse to remedy a mistake of that kind, but when the matter is carefully considered it is clear that no such icrticism can really be made. The decision of Arbitrators is final. If there is, on the face of the award, a patent inconsistency, such as a flat contradiction in measurement, or a mistake of arithmetical calculation, it is open to the Court to which application is made for filing the award, on a patent error of that sort being pointed out, to send the award back to the Arbitrators to correct it before a decree is passed in accordance with it. But anything of this kind cannot be done in execution proceedings and there is therefore a preliminary objection to the order of the barned Judge in any case. In this case a description of the dividing line is to be found in the language of the award itself and a further demonstration of the dividing line has been shown upon a map accepted by the Arbitrators and made part of the award ; therefore it is extremely doubtful whether a Court would have jurisdiction to go into the question whether the line as shown by the map was correct. That would mean really rehearing the arbitration on the merits so far as this particular point is concerned. The vice of the Court taking upon itself the decision of such a question as that is illustrated in this case by the learned Judge having taken the evidence of what is called the head Arbitrator, who says, looking at the map, that he accepted it in a hurry and that in his opinion, now looking at the terms of the award, the map is incorrect. But whatever his opinion may be to-day, it by no means follows that that opinion so expressed by him, after looking at the document, was the unanimous opinion of the Arbitrators, and therefore in any case it would appear that the only course open to a Court, under such circumstances, would have been to set aside the award and to send it back to the Arbitrators to rehear and to re-decide the question of this dividing line. However it is not really necessary to express a final opinion on that point, because this award including the map was filed by the judicial act of a competent Court after all the parties had been heard. A decree was passed and the map now in question became a part of the decree. It is quite clear that such a decree including the map can not be altered by the Court exercising jurisdiction in execution. The appeal therefore must be allowed and the order set aside with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Ryves, J.—In our opinion this appeal must succeed. The facts very briefly are as follows. Mathura Prasad on the 20th November 1917 in execution of a simple money decree held by Kashi Prasad against Musammat Jagrani Kunwar purchased the property now in suit which was recorded in her name. Two years subsequently this suit was filed by the plaintiff Musammat Anandi Kunwar for a declaration that Mathura Prasad had acquired no title by his purchase because the property did not belong to Musammat Jagrani Kunwar at all, but to herself, the plaintiff. Mathura Prasad among other pleas, pleaded that the plaintiff had held out that Musammat Sheorani Kunwar was the owner of an eight annas share in Mauza Kaendipur in which the property in suit is situated and that her claim was barred "by the principle of estoppel and under S. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act." Both Courts have decreed the suit.

The defendant Mathura Prasad appeals on the ground that on the findings of fact the suit should have been dismissed. The findings arrived at by the lower Court may be summarised briefly as follows that Bhairon Prasad was the last surviving male owner of the property in suit. During his life-time however his mother, Musammat Munna Kunwar and her two sisters were recorded as owners of 1/3rd each. He died in 1884 leaving Musammat Anandi Kunwar his widow. Instead of her name being recorded that of his mother, Musammat Munna Kunwar and two of her sisters' remained recorded as owners of one-third each of the property Both these sisters died before Musammat Munna Kunwar and she was eventually recorded as the sole owner. She died in 1907. Thereupon a dispute arose between Musammat Sheorani Kunwar the mother of Musammat Jagrani Kunwar and the plaintiff in the mutation proceedings and ultimately on the admission of Musammat Anandi Kunwar herself Musammat Sheorani Kunwar was recorded as owner of half the property. Musammat Sheorani Kunwar died in 1914 and then Musammat Jagrani Kunwar was entered as owner of the half in place of her mother.

This was the position of things when in 1917 Mathura Prasad, who lived in another village and had no connection with the family, bought the property at the execution sale It seems to us that there was really nothing to put him on inquiry. The property had been entered in the name of Musammt Jagrani Kunwar and her mother ever since 1907. If he had looked at the mutation proceedings he would have seen that Musammat Anandi Kunwar was a party to those proceedings. It seems to us that as there was nothing to put him on inquiry the principle underlying S. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act would apply. But in any case we think it is not open to Musammat Anandi Kunwar, who in 1907 deliberately by her own act got the name of Musammat Sheorani Kunwar entered as owner of half the property now to plead that she really was the owner of the whole property. In our opinion she is estopped from doing so. We therefore allow the appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's suit so far as it concerns the property entered as no. 1 in the schedule attached to the plaint, with costs in all Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Judgment.—This appeal is brought against an order which purports to be made under S. 144 C. P. C. in suit No. 789 of 1907 filed by the respondent Jwala Prasad against Sewa Singh and certain other defendants. In that suit Jwala Prasad caused the produce of 37 plots to be attached. The present appellant Sheikh Chhuttan asked that the sale of the crops might be stayed on account of a declaratory suit which he was filing. He did file such a suit against Jwala Prasad and certain third parties on 13th April 1920 for a declaration that the crops in dispute were not liable to sale under Jwala Prasad's decree but were the property of tenants cultivating from him on a batai rent so that he, Sheikh Chhuttan, was entitled to half the crops. Sheikh Chhuttan's suit was decreed by the Court of first instance. While this suit was pending an application was made by him to have the crops made over to a supurtdar and they were made over to two persons, Khumani who was a servant of Sheikh Chhuttan and one Sewa Singh. In some way which is not explained the crops were subsequently entrusted to Sheikh Chhuttan's son the second appellant Kalim-ud-din. After Sheikh Chhuttan's suit was decreed Kalim-ud-din made over half of the crops to his father and the other half to the tenants. This was about October 1920. On 28th July 1921 Sheikh Chhuttan's suit was dismissed in appeal.

Jwala Prasad's application for execution of his decree had remained pending from 28th February 1920. Thereupon on 2nd May 1921 the decree-holder Jwala Prasad filed an application which is on the record asking that the grain might be brought to sale and stating that he would take separate proceedings for the loss caused to him by the wrongful suit of Sheikh Chhuttan. The Court then issued notice to the supurtdar to produce the property for sale. Notice seems to have been served on Kalim-ud-din for the order-sheet contains an order of the Court dated 17th December 1921 stating that he objects that he was not supurtdar in this case but in the case instituted by his father. The Court overruled this objection on the ground that the property was attached in Jwala Prasad's suit and that the attachment became subject to the result of the suit subsequently filed by Sheikh Chhuttan. The Court held that Kalim-ud-din was bound to produce the property and that, being unable to do so by reason of having given it to other persons without authority from the Court, he was bound to deposit the price. Ultimately on 1st September 1922 the order out of which the present appeal arises was passed against Sheikh Chhuttan and Kalim-ud-din directing them to pay Rs. 1000 in respect of the attached crops wrongfully appropriated by them. An appeal was preferred to the District Judge. To this appeal a preliminary objection was taken that no appeal lay ; the learned Judge held that S 144 C. P. C. applied but on the merits considered that the Munsif's order was correct and declined to interfere.

The appellant's case in this Court is that the Courts below had no jurisdiction to pass an order against the appellant in execution proceedings in Jwala Prasad's suit. It is urged that neither Kalim-ud-din nor Sheikh Chhuttan was a party to that suit and further that the proceedings by which a supurtdar was appointed, and in which the alleged act of wrongful misappropriation was committed, took place in Sheikh Chhuttan's suit No. 231 of 1920 and not in Jwala Prasad's suit. It is therefore contended that Jwala Prasad's only remedy against the appellants was to institute a regular suit against them, as in the case of Sheikh Chhuttan he originally declared his intention of doing.

On behalf of the respondent decreeholder it is contended that Kalim-ud-din was supurtdar in Jwala Prasad's case and as such is liable and it is further urged that, as on the appellant's own contention the case is not covered by S. 144 C. P. C., no appeal lies to this Court.

I have no hesitation in overruling the preliminary objection. One of the issues which the Judge of the Court below had to decide was whether the case was covered by S. 144 C. P. C. He applied his mind to the question and he decided it, and the appellant cannot be deprived of his right of appeal because one of his grounds for challenging the decree is that the decision on this issue was wrong.

On the merits it is difficult to see how any proceedings under S. 144 C. P. C. could possibly be taken against the appellants in Jwala Prasad's case. Kalim-ud-din at any rate was no party to that case either in the original Court or in the execution proceedings. The order appointing him supurtdar was made in the suit filed by Sheikh Chhuttan. His position being substantially that of a receiver under Chapter XL of the Code the Court might in that suit have called on him to produce the crops or their value. It could not do so in a suit to which he was an entire stranger. Sheikh Chhuttan's only connection with Jwala Prasad's suit was the fact that he applied to have the sale of the crops stayed on the ground that he was going to file a separate suit in respect of them. Whatever further proceedings were taken by him were taken in his own suit. Moreover S. 144 only applies where a decree has been set aside in appeal or otherwise. The only decree which has been set aside is the decree in Sheik Chhuttan's suit. Whatever remedy the respondent had against the appellants was either by application in Sheikh Chhuttan's suit, to which the respondent was a party or by a separate suit. The present proceedings on his part were entirely misconceived. I therefore allow the appeal and set aside the decree against the appellants. As the appeal is allowed on a technical point I award no costs. The parties will bear their own costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

S. A. No. 1661 of 1922. Decided on 28th May 1923, from the Dt. J., Saharanpur, D/- 19th May 1922.

Substituted security—Doctrine does not apply in favour of strangers.

The doctrine of substituted security only applies where possession of a particular property has been awarded to one party in lieu of an undivided share in the whole property which was the subject of partition It does not apply when the entire property mortgaged belonged to the mortgagors and a person with no title has subsequently obtained possession of a portion of it behind the back of the mortgagees. [P 66 C 2]

S. N. Sen and Mushtaq Ahmad—for Appellants.

K. N. Katju—for Respondents.

Daniels, J.—This appeal has been argued on one single point. It relates to a shop in Landour, which together with other properties was mortgaged by the first four defendants to the defendants Nos. 5 to 12. These defendants brought a suit against their mortgagors and obtained a decree. In execution of that decree they have applied for the sale of the house in suit. The present suit was instituted by the plaintiff for a declaration that the shop was not liable to sale. The plaintiff has died during the course of the proceedings and the appellants are his heirs. The facts on which they based their claim are that in 1905. the 13th defendant instituted a partition suit against the first four defendants, and obtained a decree declaring her right over 4 sihams out of 84 in this shop and in 9 other houses and a grove. These partition proceedings were subsequent to the mortgage, and the mortgagees were not parties to them. The partition decreee is therefore not binding on the mortgagees. The plaintiff's case, and the case on which the defendant No. 13 obtained partition, was that the shop originally belonged to one Ghulam Muhammad, whose heirs were admittedly the first four and the 13th defendants. It is now found as a fact by both the Courts below that this particular shop did not belong to Ghulam Muhammad. The 13th defendant therefore had no right to any share in it, and as regards this shop had no right to the partition decree which she obtained. In the partition which was subsequently carried out she was allotted 6/7th of the shop in suit. Her rights have been subsequently transferred to the plaintiff. The appellants' contention is that the doctrine of substituted security should be applied, and that the mortgage instead of attaching to the properties mortgaged should be transferred to the properties which the first four defendants obtained in lieu of the 6/7th share given to the 13th defendant in this house This contention has been repelled by the Courts below, and in our opinion rightly so. The doctrine of substituted security only applies where possession of a particular property has been awarded to one party in lieu of an undivided share in the whole property which was the subject of partition. It does not apply when the entire property mortgaged belonged to the mortgagors, and a person with no title has subsequently obtained possession of a portion of it behind the back of the mortgagees. The mortgage when executed was a perfectly valid mortgage, and the mortgagees are entitled to take out execution against any portion of the mortgaged property. Their right cannot be affected by any subsequent transfer to the plaintiff or his predecessor-in-interest. We accordingly affirm the decision of the Court below and dismiss the appeal with costs.

P. C. A. No. 3 of 1923, Decided on 25th May 1923.

Civil P, C., S. 110—Substantial question of law—Abatement under O. 22 R. 9—Effect—Adoption—Divesting of estate.

The question, whether a suit was not maintainable, because a previous action commenced by the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff had abated under Order 22 rule 9, is not a substantial question of law within the meaning of S, 110. [P 67 C 1]

A suit was instituted by a Hindu widow in possession of the estate of her late husband, During the pendency of the suit she adopted a son. At some stage in the trial the question was raised whether, after this adoption, it was not incumbent upon the lady to bring upon the record as plaintiff in the suit the name of the minor boy and then to continue the action as his next freind. The contention was repelled by the trial Court. There was at the time of the adoption an agreement between the lady herself and the father of the boy the effect of which was to vest the management, at any rate, of the estate in the hands of the lady until the boy should attain majority, [P 67 C 2]

Held: the question whether the widow could be allowed to proceed with the suit was not substantial question of law, [P 68 C 1]

Haidar Mehdi—for Appellant.

P. L. Banerjee and U. S. Bajpai—for Respondent.

Piggott, J.—The question before us is whether we can or ought to certify that the appeal proposed to be preferred by the unsuccessful defendant appellant, against a decision of this Court, dated the 3rd of August 1922, satisfies the conditions laid down by S. 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so as to make it a proper case for an appeal to His Majesty in Council. As regards the value of the subject matter in dispute it is admitted that the requisite conditions are fulfilled. It is however also admitted that inasmuch as this Court affirmed the decision of the Court below, this appeal must involve some substantial question of law before we can certify it as a suitable appeal to be preferred to His Majesty in Council. We had to deal in substance with two points, and the petition laid before us to-day shows that these are the points which it is desired to raise before His Majesty in Council. Neither of these points has anything whatever to do with the merits of the case. They were both of them objections of a highly technical character, not affecting the right of the plaintiff in the action to recover the money claimed, but only the procedure adopted in the course of the action for its recovery. One contention was that the suit was not maintainable, because a previous action commenced by the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff had abated under Order 22 rule 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We disposed of this technical objection by an argument, also technical in its nature, the effect of which was that it was quite impossible to hold that the previous suit referred to in the pleadings had "abated" within the meaning of the rule in question. We are in no way prepared to certify that the question thus decided by us was a substantial question of law within the meaning of S. 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The other point requires to be stated in some further detail. The suit was instituted by Rani Sujan Kunwar as a Hindu Widow in possession of the estate of her late husband. uring the pendency of the action she adopted a son. At some stage or other in the course of the trial the question was raised whether, after this adoption, it was not incumbent upon the lady to bring upon the record as plaintiff in the suit the name of the minor boy whom she had adopted and then to continue the action as his next friend or natural guardian. This contention was repelled by the trial Court. We pointed out, when it was raised before us in appeal, that it would have been open to the trial Court to accept the contention and to meet it by a formal order bringing the minor in question on to the record. At the same time, having regard to certain facts which were proved at the trial as to the circumstances under which the adoption was effected, we found that the Court below had not been wrong in the procedure actually adopted by it, that is to say in permitting the widow lady to continue the action in her own name. There was the time of the adoption an agreement between the lady herself and the father of the boy who was given and taken in adoption, the effect of which was to vest the management, at any rate, of the estate in the hands of the lady until the boy should attain majority. It is now contended before us that a substantial question of law is here involved, because of the general principle of Hindu law by which a widow, making an adoption to her deceased husband, at once divests herself of the estate in favour of the son so adopted. Our attention has been drawn to certain cases in which the question has been considered whether an agreement entered into at the time of the adoption, the object of which is to postpone its effect until the death of the widow, would be valid or enforceable as against the adopted son. In the case before us the validity of the agreement is not being contested, and so far as we know has never been contested, by the adopted son. It is the plaintiff in the action, that is to say the widow, who is seeking to protect the rights of the minor by continuing this action for his benefit. She instituted it at a time when she herself represented the estate of her late husband. She has been permitted to continue it on the strength of the authority exercisable by her under the agreement entered into at the time of the adoption. We are not prepared to certify that any substantial qsestion of law of general importance is involved in our decision on this point.

The application is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Civ. Rev. No. 14 of 1923 Decided on 19th April 1923 from the S. C. C. J. of Allahabad, D/- 26th Sept. 1923.

Civil P. C., S. 60—Provident Funds Act (IX of 1897)—The fund does not become attachable till paid.

I. B. Banerjee.—for Appellant.

L. M. Banerjee.—for Opposite-Party.

Daniels, J.—This is a revision from an order of the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court, Allahabad. The point for decision before him was whether a deposit in a provident fund, which so long as the subscriber was in service was a compulsory deposit within the meaning of S. 2 (4) of the Provident Funds Act (Act IX of 1897) became attachable by a creditor the moment the subscriber retired. The subscriber in this case has retired but has not yet drawn his deposit. The learned Judge of the Court below has followed the decision in Veerchand v. B. B. and C I. Ry. and has held that the deposit is not attachable. The learned Judges took the view that compulsory deposit in the Act was a term with a technical meaning and that a deposit which came within the definition remained a compulsory deposit until it was actually drawn out. The subscriber's retirement made no difference to its nature. The same view, as was held in Bombay, has been taken by the High Court of Calcutta, in Hindley v. Joynarain (2), in which the Bombay case, was followed and approved. Another Bombay case, Nagin Das v. Ghelabhai, (3) has gone even further and held that the deposit is protected even after payment to the subscriber. It is not necessary to go to the length of the last mentioned decision in the present case. Against the authority of two High Courts the applicant can only cite an earlier single Judge case of the Bombay High Court which was overruled in the case relied on by the Court below. The learned pleader for the applicant has attempted to distinguish the Bombay ruling on the ground that it was optional with the subscriber in the first place whether to join the Provident Fund or not. This makes no difference in view of the definition contained in S. 2 (4) of the Act. The question, whether a deposit is a compulsory deposit, depends on whether it was repayable on demand or at the option of the subscriber. Under the Provident Fund rules which have been placed before me the deposit in this case was not so repayable. It is also urged that in certain cases an advance might be given to the subscriber out of the deposit even before retirement. This also does not affect the question of law involved, for this advance could only be given under the orders of the sanctioning authority for special cause shown and not at the option of the subscriber. The weight of authority is distinctly in favour of the view taken by the Court below and I dismiss the application with costs.

Mis. Case No. 18 of 1923 Decided on 31st May 1923 from the Dt. and S. J., Benares, D/-3rd October 1922.

Legal Practitioners Act, S. 36—High Court can revise order under S. 36.—Decision of D. J. against the weight of evdence is no ground for interference.

The High Court in the exercise of its discretion can send for the record of an enquiry conducted by a District Judge with a view to drawing up a list of persons proved to be touts, and examine such record and thereafter issue such orders or instructions to the District Judge as might appear to be proper. High Court would not interfere in the exercise of its powers of superintendence, where the sole ground upon which interference was asked for was that the decision of the Dt. Judge was against the weight of the evidence. The intention of the Legislature was not to allow anything of the nature of an appeal against the decision of a competent Court under S. 36 of Act No. 18 of 1879. High Court cannot consider whether the circumstantial evidence relied upon by a Dt. Judge, and set forth in his order, was or was not evidence from which High Court would have drawn the same inference. [P 69 C 2]

J. M. Banerjee—for Applicant.

L. M. Banerjee—for Opposite Party.

Piggott, J.—We have before us four applications from persons in respect of whom the District Judge of Benares has passed an order under S. 36 of the Legal Practitioners' Act No. 18 of 1879, that is to say, the names of each one of these four persons have been put by the District Judge in a list of persons who are proved to his satisfaction, by evidence of general repute or otherwise, habitually, to act as touts. The word "tout", we may note, is defined by S. 3 of the same Act.. In the case of two of the persons concerned, namely Kashi Nath and Sarju Dat, notice was ordered to issue and the learned Government Advocate has appeared to support the order of the District Judge. The other two applications, namely those of Abdul Hamid and Sital Pandey, were simply ordered to be laid before this Bench, to be dealt with in such manner as this Court might see fit after hearing arguments in the other two cases. The learned Government Advocate has raised the general question of the right of this Court to interfere in revision with an order passed by the District Judge, or other competent Court, under S. 36 of Act No. 18 of 1879. That is a question which has more than once been before this Court; but the standard authority on the subject is the decision of a Bench of two Judges, one of them the then Chief Justice of this Court, passed in "In the Matter of the Petition of Madho Ram" (1) in the year 1899. We agree with the learned Judges who decided that case, that this Court could only interfere with an order, such as that now before us, in the exercise of the general powers of superintendence conferred upon it by what is now S. 107 of the Government of India Act. We are satisfied that those powers are extensive enough to authorise this Court, in the exercise of its discretion to send for the record of such a proceeding in a Subordinate Court, namely the record of an enquiry conducted by a District Judge with a view to drawing up a list of persons proved to be touts, and to examine such record and thereafter issue such orders or instructions to the District Judge as might appear to be proper. The question remains, however, what principles this Court should lay down to govern the exercise of its discretion in this matter. The learned Judges who decided Madho Ram's case above referred to laid down one principle of considerable importance. This was that this Court would not interfere in the exercise of its powers of superintendence, where the sole ground upon which interference was asked for was that the decision of the District Judge was against the weight of the evidence. We desire to stand by that principle. It is quite clear from the wording of S. 36 of Act No. 18 of 1879 that the Legislature intended to confer upon the Courts therein mentioned, including the Court of a District Judge, a very wide discretion in the matter. The District Judge is authorised to frame and publish a list of persons proved to his satisfaction, by evidence of general repute or otherwise, habitually to act as touts. It has been pressed upon us that the word 'touts' as used in this section, refers back to the definition in the preceding section No. 3 of the same Act. This is undoubtedly so: but what is laid down in S. 36 is that the District Judge has discretion to frame and publish a list of persons who are proved to his satisfaction to behave in the manner set forth in the definition of the word "tout" in S. 3. The only qualifications imposed by the Act on the exercise of this discretion are that the District Judge must be satisfied by evidence of general repute or otherwise, and further that no person's name is to be included in such a list until he has had an opportunity of showing cause against such inclusion. We may say in this connection that we should certainly hold it a valid ground for interference by this Court, in the exercise of its general powers of supervision, if the District Judge had disobeyed this latter direction and had included in his list of touts the name of a person who had never been allowed an opportunity of showing cause against such inclusion. We return now to the obvious fact that it was never the intention of the Legislature to allow anything of the nature of an appeal against the decision of a competent Court under S. 36 of Act No. 18 of 1879. We cannot allow our general powers of supervision to be invoked so as, in effect, to create a right of appeal which was never intended by the Lagislature. In the cases now before us it is sought to bring the matter within the scope of the revisional jurisdiction, represented as falling somewhat short of the jurisdiction exerciseable by a Court of Appeal, by representing that the record of the enquiry conducted by the District Judge, discloses as against each of the four persons whose petitions lie before us no legal or relevant evidence to warrant the finding arrived at by the District Judge that they habitually do act as touts. The plain fact of the matter is that, as regards each of these four persons, direct evidence was wanting; but there was laid before the District Judge certain circumstantial evidence, from which the District Judge drew the inference as against each of these persons that they were habitually acting as touts. In our opinion it would be straining the powers of superintendence conferred on this Court and setting undesirable precedent, if we were to take it upon ourselves in every instance of this kind to consider whether the circumstantial evidence relied upon by a District Judge, and set forth in his order, was or was not evidence upon which we ourselves, would have drawn the same inference. We think the Legislature intended that the District Judge should be master in his own Court to this extent. The result is that we are not prepared to interfere in any one of the four cases before us, and each of the applications stands dismissed accordingly.

Application dismissed.

Judgment.—This is a Civil Revision from a decree of the Court of Small Causes. The suit was based on a promissory note executed by the defendant on the 16th of April 1919. The suit was filed on the 28th of April 1922. The defendant put in a written statement, the second paragraph of which runs as follows :—

"The plaintiff (who is a Jotshi) led the defendant to believe that he would perform adequate Puja which would have the effect of saving the lives of his children and they would survive the age of one year, and for this the defendant agreed to pay Rs. 30 to the plaintiff out of which Rs. 8 was paid in cash and the balance was payable after the child had survived the age of one year." It was on this understanding that the promissory note was written. The child died within a year of its birth and hence nothing was payable. The other ground taken was that the suit was barred by limitation, It appears from the record that five witnesses on behalf of the defendant were present but as a matter of fact the Court took no evidence at all holding that it was not open to the defendant who admitted the execution of the promissory note to plead want of consideration and reliance was placed on Sri Ram v. Sabha Ram Gopal Rai (1). I do not think that ruling is applicable in this case I think under the 3rd proviso to S. 92 of the Indian Evidence Act the Court should have allowed evidence to be taken on this point. But it is unnecessary to decide this as I hold against the plaintiff on the second point. On the face of it the suit is barred by limitation as it was not filed until the 28th of April 1922. In order to bring it within limitation it was pointed out that in some other suit (not between these parties) this promissory note had been exhibited and on that occasion, some time in 1920, the defendant had admitted its execution. The Court has held that the mere fact that on the back of the note there is in the handwriting of the defendant the words "Execution admitted," and the endorsement of the Munsif showing the date is a sufficient compliance of the provisions of S. 19 of the Indian Limitation Act. It seems to me that the mere fact that in some other case the defendant merely admitted the execution of the document is not an acknowledgment of liability within the meaning of the section. No evidence was taken and there is nothing but the endorsement. In my opinion it has not been shown that the suit was within limitation, it therefore should have been dismissed. I accordingly allow this application and set aside the decree of the Court below with costs.

Criminal Mis. No. 72 of 1923 Decided on 21st May, 1923.

Criminal P. C, S. 526—Transfer of case pending in another province.

High Court has no jurisdiction to transfer criminal cases which are in the course of hearing in another province. 44 C, 595 Dist. nor has it jurisdiction to declare e. g. that a particular case is triable exclusively in Benares and not in Calcutta. [P 71 C 2 P 72 C 1]

Saila Nath Mukherji—for Applicant.

Judgment.—This is in my opinion in substance an application for transfer. It is apparently proposed to do it by indirect means, first getting a letter of request from Allahabad to Calcutta, then an order of stay or postponement out of the Magistrate at Calcutta, and then a declaration out of Allahabad that case is exclusively triable in Benares. Nobody can doubt that all that complicated machinery is really an application for transfer. As an application for transfer it is bound to fail. This Court has no jurisdiction to transfer criminal cases which are in the course of hearing in another province. Apparently Calcutta High Court thought otherwise in the case of Charu Chandra Majumdar v. Emperor (1). But the Madras High Court did not agree and I prefer the Madras view. All that will be wiped out as irrelevant, by the new S. 185 as amended by the Criminal Procedure Code of 1923 when it becomes law. Mr. Saila Nath Mukerji quite naturally objected to my describing the application as one for transfer, because as an application for transfer it was bound to fail, and I will therefore deal with it in the language in which this application is presented to this Court. This Court is asked to declare that this case is triable exclusively in Benares and not in Calcutta. This Court has no jurisdiction to make any such declaration, and I should not in any event, even if there were jurisdiction, make a declaration which was a nullity. Secondly this Court is asked to stay all further proceedings in the Second Presidency Magistrate's Court at Calcutta. This Court has no jurisdiction over the Second Presidency Magistrate's Court at Calcutta. The application is dismissed. The certified copies of the Calcutta proceedings are to be returned forthwith to Mr. S. N. Mukerji.

Criminal A. No. 81 of 1923 Decided on 15th May 1923. from the S. J., Bulandshahr, D/-22nd December 1922.

G. W. Dillon—for Appellants.

The Asstt. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Walsh, J.—This is a very difficult case which has given us a great deal of trouble, and the result of which probably involves a miscarriage of justice, but speaking for myself I have no doubt whatever as to the legal principles applicable to it, and as to the applicability of them to the peculiar circumstances of the various appellants before us. Now there are three cases, each of them involving a large number of alleged dacoits, who were tried together for participation in three separate dacoities, committed at different times, and at different places, but round about the same season and round about the same neighbourhood. Their connection arose more from the alleged co-operation of a large number of the accused in each of them, than from any other circumstance showing direct connection between the three dacoities. There were really four in all, and I desire to say at once, because I shall have something to say hereafter by way of criticism, that the police and the Sessions Judge were alike confronted with a difficult task.

We are dealing today witb one only of these dacoities, namely that committed at Sarai Chabila on the night between the 23rd and 24th of July, at the house of one Rate Ram and others in the same compound. The other appeals relate to dacoities committed on the 9th of March of the same year 1922, and on the 28th of June 1922. The 4th dacoity, which the Judge says was thought by the investigating officer to be closely connected with this dacoity by reason of its being carried out by the same participants, occured on the 20th of July.

We have not heard the other appeals, but we are told by the Assistant Government Advocate that in substance, and in respect of the characteristics which have evoked our criticisms of the judgment in this case, the other two appeals which are still pending do not greatly differ from this, and therefore although this decision does not govern the others, this case on the other hand must be considered to be a type of the others, and the result in the others when we reach them must be governed by the principles which we propose to lay down in this, and the criticisms which we propose to pass upon the procedure unfortunately adopted in this case must be read with reference to the other cases mutatis mutandis.

It cannot be denied that the general characteristics in this case at any rate, and we are told both by the counsel for the defence and by the Assistant Government Advocate that the same characteristics apply to the other appeals, resemble more gang case, in which the evidence obtained by the police, mainly through approvers of association, and active participation in planning and preparation and so forth, are applicable to a class of persons varying in number who have set out to commit a series of joint crimes. The learned judge himself, as shown by his judgment experienced insuperable difficulty in avoiding reference to the other cases from time to time, and he also from time to time utilised to a quite considerable extent material which he had got, either from the police evidence, or from what seems not at all improbable also police diaries, tending to throw suspicion and afford clues which were entertained by the police generally against particular individuals before they got any definite information with regard to the commission of this or other of the dacoities which I have mentioned. Another characteristic is that there is a total absence, very unusual in a case where so many convictions have been secured in the commission of a particular dacoity in a particular village, of any attempt to obtain identification by villagers or the complainants or their households, and none of them have been called to give evidence.

Another exceptional characteristic is that, with the exception of an absconding accused to whom we shall have to refer again, no loot has been traced, and as against the 17 appellants who have been convicted there is no evidence of any loot found in their possession.

We now come to the peculiar and embarassing features of this case. One of the appellants is a man named Kishan. Somehow, it does not matter how, the police got his name and came into touch with him. He immediately informed them that he was ready to give information, He admitted (this of course is in the nature of a confession which is rendered inadmissible by law and it really ought not to have appeared upon the evidence at all) participation in the dacoities into which the police were enquiring, and he plainly intimated to the police that he was willing to tell them what he knew for a consideration. Eventually he was put up under S. 164 Criminal Procedure Code. He made an elaborate statement under that section amounting to a confession. He was put upon his trial and has been convicted and that confession has been used by the learned Judge not merely under S 30 of the Evidence Act against all the appellants as the confession of a co-accused, but it has, and this is the real difficulty in the case, formed the foundation and main structure of the whole of the learned Judge's reasoning in the judgment. No criticism could be passed upon the learned Judge for his method of dealing with the rest of the evidence, if this confession had been admissible. He has sought. and found to his own satisfaction, adequate corroboration of the confession in the case of each person whom he has convicted upon it, but the serious question is whether it was admissible at all. Both of us are satisfied beyond question that it was not only inadmissible, but that the learned Judge has really made a serious mistake in not realising from the first how clearly on his own statement it was rendered inadmissible. The Assistant Government Advocate did not attempt to combat the view which we take upon the assumption that the learned Judge meant what he said. What the learned Judge has said is this:—first Kishan was clearly asking for a pardon. He refused to give any information to the police until some quid pro quo could be, as he hoped, obtained. Secondly, he communicated his frame of mind to Ram Sarup, the investigating officer, Thirdly, on the morning of the 6th of August, Ram Sarup took Kishan to the Collector's bungalow for the express purpose of negotiating for a pardon. It is not suggested that Kishan took part in the negotiation.

Of course he did not. But it would be equally absurd to suppose that he was not well aware of the object of the visit to the Collector's bungalow. There was a hitch in the negotiations. Ram Sarup and Kishan were sent back to the Sub-Divisional Officer with a note and some of Kishan's statement was recorded that day. The rest of it was completed the next morning. It would not be a violent presumption to conclude that having regard to all that had passed before, Kishan, when he returned to the Sub-Divisional officer from the visit to the Collector's bungalow in the custody of the investigating officer, entertained, and had been encouraged to entertain, reasonable hope that if he told the truth, or what appeared to be a truthful story he would get a pardon in the end. The learned judge uses this language:—The meaning of this exchange of notes between the Collector and the Sub-Divisional Magistrate has been explained. The Collector apparently was at first of the opinion that Kishan should be given a pardon which was clearly what Kishan was working for. Indeed it would appear that Kishan specifically bargained for a pardon as the price of his statement. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate objected that it would be premature to make a firm offer of the pardon at that stage and the Collector eventually agreed and it was explained to Kishan that he would have to take his chance and he then made his statement. So stated the positio . is as clear as daylight. If a man prepares the ground by expressing his own position, and invites the other party to treat with him, and the other party goes so far as to consider whether he is willing to pay the price, and eventually, without refusing to do so, postpones the decis on until further examination of the article to be sold, there must remain in the mind of the proposing vendor a reasonable hope that when the purchaser sees the article he is thinking of buying he will pay the price. I have used this commercial language, because throughout, the matter was discussed by the executive authorities, and has been considered by the judge, in the light of negotiations for a bargain. How the learned judge could possibly come to the conclusion that the making of the confession by Kishan under S. 164 Criminal Procedure Code was not caused by the inducement that, if it was satisfactory, a pardon would probably be granted to him. I cannot for myself conceive, but in my opinion he has plainly found that it was so induced, and where he has failed is in not realizing that S. 24 makes a confession so induced irrelevant in a criminal proceeding. Mr. Malcomson, on behalf of the Crown preferred to take his stand upon a denial that the learned Judge meant what we think he said in his judgment, and we therefore allowed him to obtain, and tender, copies of the correspondence referred to by the judge. Any doubt lurking in the mind of anybody upon this point is entirely removed by a perusal of this remarkable correspondence. The Sub-Divisional Officer and the District Magistrate exchanged notes with the greatest candour, as indeed they might, in considering whether or not a pardon should be offered, but they went much further than that. They discussed the terms of the offer, or bargain which was to be made with the accused. The District Magistrate signed the note on the 6th of August and wrote to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate as follows:—" he may however be told that if he makes a voluntary confession which is considered to be full and true, his prayer for being made an approver will receive due consideration". How in the world any officer of experience, or anyone with any legal training at all, or acquaintance with this section, could doubt that this was an inducement to the man to make a statement, we are at a loss to understand. The very document in which the Magistrate uses that language contains a statement that the confession must be voluntary and without any inducement. The Sub-Divisional Officer in his note expressed his opinion that there was very little value in such a confession. Whether there is, or whether there is not, any intrinsic value in the statement, the law makes it irrelevant, and the learned Judge ought to have refused to bring it on the record, and to have ruled it as irrelevant under S. 24 of the Evidence Act. The result is that it has to be struck out of this case, as well as of the other cases in which appeals are pending, and in which it has been used. We are bound to say that it really is a lamentable result of the expenditure of time and money on this case, and that the error into which both the Judge and the District Magistrate have fallen is an elementry one. Judges from time to time have exhausted themselves in endeavouring to explain the working of this section and for my own part I refer to and repeat what I said in the recent case of Khatel v. Emperor, (1) with which my learned brother entirely agrees. It really ought to be unnecessary for judges constantly to be referring to the working of this section. It looks as though we were endeavouring to lay down some new principle, when really all we do is to repeat the law as it should be known by those who have to administer it.

This, however, does not dispose of all the difficulties in this case. The learned Judge in most painstaking judgment has reviewed all the evidence, but when Kishan's confession is struck out, the balance against the remaining appellants consists of the sworn testimony and indentification made by the approver Ghafur, and, as against certain appellants, the evidence of one Musammat Ganga Dei. As a question of principle is involved in their evidence, it is necessary to consider whether, as a class those mentioned by Ganga Dei ought to be convicted, unless her evidence is corroborated by satisfactory independent testimony. Somehow or other the police got hold of this woman, and it was a creditable piece of detective work, but her husband was a notorious decoit who was absconding. According to her, he left his house on the night of the dacoity with several of the appellants, and next day returned with the loot. In any case, it is certain that her husband is a fugitive from justice. According to her testimony he is implicated in this dacoity, and probably, in the others too, and he left in his house, and probably in her custody, silver ornaments and other jewellery, the proceeds of this dacoity. She may or may not have motives of either spite or fear against specific individuals whom she has named. She may or may not have been either persuaded or frightened by the police but taking her position broadly she was placed in considerable difficulty. She had every motive for assisting the police, every motive for naming any one whom the police wished her to name. The police were in a position to put pressure upon her by the very fact of her possession of the property, and to use persuation with her by the very fact that her husband was absconding. In the case of a low class woman in this country who has very little independence, education or public spirit to influence her, it is obvious that such a person may become an easy victim to an astute police investigator, and all I can say is that if I had a jury trying this case I should unhesitatingly have told them that they should not convict a single individual on the testimony of the woman alone. It is made no better when there is added to it the testimony of the approver, who is one of the most despicable specimens of humanity one can imagine, a man steeped in crime, living at war with society, ready to commit any violence to enable him to carry out his thefts, and ready to sell his comrades if only he can get freedom for himself, and for my own part I am not prepared to accept the evidence of a worthless creature of this kind, as corroborating and almost equally worthless and particularly helpless wife of an absconding dacoit. The difficulty in this case is that having acted as the judge has done, very largely on the confession of Kishan, one does not know whether he would have been prepared to act on the residium which I have just mentioned after Kishan was withdrawn, and really the logical thing to do would be to send the case back, but we are agreed that in substance nothing is to be gained by that, and we therefore deal with the case by final orders. In the case of four of the appellants (leaving out Kishan for the moment) we find that the evidence of Ghafur is satisfactorily corroborated by the learned Judge's view of the evidence. These four are Kallan, Nasib Khan, Aslub and Zabar Khan. In the case of these four we dismiss their appeals and confirm their convictions and sentences. In the case of the remainder, namely Tara, Dalip, Azan Kanhaiya, Bucha, Khasheru, Budhan, Khiali, Chiranji Bihu or Baba, Kallan son of Ghasita and Diwan, we are driven by force of law to allow their appeals and to direct that they be released subject to any other punishment standing against them unperformed.

This leaves only the case of Kishan. His appeal is also dismissed and we confirm his conviction and sentence. As I have already said his confession was irrelevant, but my brother pointed out during the argument and Mr. Malcomson has also argued, that in substance he confessed again before the trial, when he was examined under S. 364, before the Committing Magistrate, his previous statement under S. 164 was put to him. It ought not to have been if they knew as much about it as we do now. But he then stated that he had no hope of a pardon. He had discovered that his previous hopes were doomed to disappointment, and he said that statement was true. Whether it was or whether it was not, and the probability is that it was not, it is ample on which to convict him, and I am prepared to agree that that amounts to a fresh confession in the Magistrate's Court, which was duly proved against him at the trial, and that his conviction on that ground must stand. It may be said, if so, why is it not a confession made before the trial so as to be proved at the trial affecting the other persons who were being tried jointly with him. I think that technically it could be used under S. 30 even against his co-accused. But however satisfactory it may be as a piece of damning testimony against himself, I am not prepared to regard it as of any real value, standing alone, or even in association with the evidence of Ghafur and Ganga Dei, against the other accused. Therefore on that ground in my opinion it is still to be disregarded except as sufficient to convict Kishan. Our order therefore is that the appeals of the above five are dismissed and of the others are allowed and their convictions are set aside.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—I agree with the order proposed.

Criminal P. C., S. 526—Applies to enquiries under Workman's Breach of Contract Act (13 of 1859.)

An enquiry under the Act 13 of 1859 is an enquiry by a Magistrate or a Criminal Court within S. 6 Criminal Procedure Code and although the object of the enquiry is merely to issue coercive orders and if necessary to enforce the same by a sentence of imprisonment, there is nothing to show that such an enquiry is excluded from the operation of S. 526 Cr. P. Code. The definition of "enquiry" given in S. 4 clause (k) which includes every enquiry other than a trial conducted under the Code of Criminal Procedure by a Magistrate or a Court, is not exhaustive so as to exclude an enquiry under the Workman's Breach of Contract Act of the nature above referred to.]P, 77 C. 1]

A. P. Dube—for Applicants.

Judgment.—This is an application for the transfer of a proceeding pending against certain labourers under S. 2 of the Workman's Breach of Contract Act (No. 13 of 1859) as amended by Act No. XII of 1920. The employer is a resident of Moradabad and carries on a stone ballast business in Shankergarh in the district of Allahabad. He advanced money to certain labourers and employed them for the purpose of working at Shankergarh. His complaint was that after working for a little while they disappeared. That complaint is being enquired into by one of the Magistrates at Moradabad. The labourers are residents of Shankergarh and desire that the complaint should be enquired into in the district of Allahabad where the alleged breach of contract is said to have taken place. It is admitted that the advances were made at Shankergarh and that if any breach of contract took place it must have taken place at Shankergarh too. The witnesses are all said to belong to the same place. It is therefore conducive to the convenience of the parties, if the case is enquired into at Allahabad. It is urged on behalf of the employer that the Workman's Breach of Contract Act intends that such enquiry should be made at the place where the master or employer resides and carries on business. The Act does not, however, lay down the procedure which is to regulate such an enquiry. It is an enquiry by a Magistrate or a Criminal Court within the meaning of S. 6 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and although the object of the enquiry is merely to issue coercive orders and if necessary to enforce the same by a sentence of imprisonment, there is nothing to show that such an enquiry is excluded from the operation of S. 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The definition of "enquiry" given in S. 4, clause (k) which includes every enquiry other than a trial conducted under the Code of Criminal Procedure by a Magistrate or a Court, is not exhaustive so as to exclude an enquiry under the Workman's Breach of Contract Act of the nature above referred to. Any enquiry by a Magistrate or a Criminal Court subordinate to this Court can therefore be transferred under S. 526 Criminal Procedure Code to any Criminal Court of equal or superior jurisdiction subordinate to its authority, if the requisite grounds set forth in the section are established. The balance of convenience is undoubtedly in favour of the transfer of the criminal proceeding from Moradabad to Allahabad. The application is therefore allowed and the proceeding transferred to the Court of the District Magistrate of Allahabad who can try the case himself or send it for trial to any Magistrate subordinate to him who may be competent to try the same.

Application allowed.

The complaint was that the accused had no bona fide intention to carry on the business of a commission agent at Bombay and that he dishonestly obtained money from the complainant under the pretext that he would carry on such business and wrongfully appropriated what was paid to him from time to time, including any profits derived from the purchase and sale of the goods on behalf of the complainant. The entire negotiation between the parties is said to have been carried on by correspondence. So far as the charge of cheating is concerned, if the allegations made by the complainant are true, the offence, if any, is triable as much at Bombay as at Basti ; but so far as the charge of a criminal breach of trust goes, it can only be enquired into and tried by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offence was committed or any part of the property which is the subject of the offence was received or retained by the accused. The Magistrate at Basti had therefore jurisdiction to try the former charge but not the latter. The learned counsel, who appears for the complainant, states that the complainant is prepared to proceed with the former charge in the Court of the Magistrate at Basti and to drop the latter for the present. S. 179 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is controlled in respect of certain offences by S. 181 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; and as pointed out in Charu Chander v. Emperor (1) no question of convenience or expediency can be considered under S. 185 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That section deals only with questions of competency when they are involved in doubt. There is no such doubt in this case. The Court below is therefore directed to proceed with the trial under S. 420 of the Indian Penal Code and to drop so far as that Court is concerned the charge under S. 406.

Judgment.—The appellants Ghulam Husain, Fida Hussian Raza Husain and Maqbul Husain are the brothers of one Musammat Chanda prostitute. They were charged under S. 304 of the Indian Penal Code with culpable homicide in causing the death of one Sukha. The learned Sessions Judge on the supposed authority of Emperor v. Bhola (1) has altered the charge to one under S. 325 and with the concurrence of the assessors as regards three of the accused has convicted them under that section. As regards Raza Husain the assessors appear to have been impressed by an alibi which he put forward but I agree with the learned Sessions Judge that the evidence in support of this alibi is of no value.

It is common ground that there was considerable previous ill-feeling between Mst. Chanda and her brothers on the one side and Sukha and the principal witness Inayet Ullah on the other. Three days before the present occurrence a youth named Tajju who belonged to the party of the deceased had been beaten by the other party near Chanda's house and a report had been made about it. On the day in question, 5th November 1922, Inayet Ullah and Sukha, according to the prosecution evidence, were passing Musammat Chanda's house. The four accused were there and Musammat Chanda incited them to attack the deceased and his companions, which they did. It is probable that there was some previous exchange of abuse or verbal quarrel which Inayet Ullah has suppressed in his evidence. However that may be, Inayet Ullah was attacked and very badly beaten. The medical evidence shows that he had at least 12 different injuries, the first and most serious of which was on the head. His companion Sukha received injuries of which he died in hospital four days later. The vault of the skull was extensively fractured and broken into 5 or 6 pieces as the result of one or more lathi blows. There were four other marks of injury on different parts of Sukha's person. The only injury sustained by any of accused's party was a contusion on the left temple and a black eye on the person of Ghulam Husain. Besides the evidence of Inayet Ullah the prosecution case is supported by three other witnesses who saw the accused beating the deceased and his companion. The story put forward on behalf of the accused and supported by three witnesses is that one Munna came from the toddy shop near by, abused Musammat Chanda and threatend to cut off her nose and to beat her brothers. Three of the accused beat him and drove him back to the shop. He then returned with five other persons including Sukha and Inayet Ullah, all armed with lathis. Inayet Ullah slapped Musammat Chanda and on Ghulam Husain remonstrating, hit him on the head knocking him down. Two of his brothers then came out and a fight ensued between them.

I should have been glad of a little more assistance from the learned Judge in the way of detailed comment on the evidence, but I agree with the conclusion at which the learned Judge has arrived that the prosecution evidence is to be preferred to that of the defence. The latter is obviously difficult if not impossible to reconcile with the medical evidence. The witnesses who support the prosecution story apart from Inayet Ullah are independent witnesses against whom no ground for partiality is established. The suggestion made on behalf of the accused to account for the complainant's party having received some 18 injuries one of which proved fatal as against two small injuries sustained by Ghulam Husain is that Sukha and Inayet Ullah were drunk. No question on this point was put to the Doctor who admitted them to hospital and the only evidence which goes in any way to support the story is a statement elicited in cross-examination from the head constable Asfandyar Khan who recorded Inayet Ullah's report. The learned Judge does not refer to this evidence but I cannot help feeling strong doubt as to the truth of the assertion. In the first place, no note of it was made at the time of recording the report and a man who was really drunk could hardly have dictated the detailed report which was made by Inayet Ullah at the time.

I am not sure the learned Judge correctly appreciated the law as regards the liability of several accused who jointly attacked the same person and inflicted fatal injuries on him. The learned Judge refers to the case of Emperor v. Bhola (1) but the judgment in that case has to be read in the light of a more recent case in Emperor v. Ram Newaz (2). If several persons jointly attack the deceased with lathis fracturing his skull and inflicting a number of other injuries they are all equally guilty even though it may not be possible to prove which of them actually inflicted the fatal below. In the present case it was quite unnecessary for the learned Sessions Judge to have altered the charge. It is however unnecessary for me to alter the conviction as no application in revision is before me and an offence under S. 325 was certainly committed. For the reasons already given I dismiss the appeal of all four accused.

Ryves, J:—The facts out which this appeal arises are as follows:—Bhagelu brought a suit against Musammat Dharma for restitution of conjugal rights and as Musammat Dharma was a minor her uncle Sampat was made guardian ad litem. The trial Court decreed the suit. An appeal was filed in the lower appellate Court on behalf of the minor by the minor's father Manbodh. There had been no order removing Sampat from guardianship. The lower appellate Court commented on the fact that although Sampat had been appointed guardian ad litem in the lower Court the appeal had been filed through Manbodh. In the result the Court allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

On appeal before us it has been urged that there was no valid appeal before the lower appellate Court and our attention was called to the recent decision of a Bench of this Court in Shambhu v. Kanhaiya (1) which is exactly in point. It was there held that where a guardian ad litem to a minor defendant has once been appointed, such appointment continues for the whole the of lis or until it is revoked by Court, and the guardian so appointed is the only person who can file an appeal on behalf of the minor. That decision follows several other decisions of this Court which are mentioned in the course of the judgment and also a Madras case. It seems to us that we are bound to follow this course of decisions. It may be that the defendant has a remedy open to him as suggested in the case of Bawan Das Bishnath (2). We allow the appeal following the decisions of this Court and setting aside the decree of the Court below restore that of the first Court. We make no order as to costs.

The following is the Refering Order passed by Hon Mr. Justice Daniels.—This revision raises a question of some importance which is likely to recur. The defendant borrowed money from the plaintiff's father and executed a bond agreeing to repay it on a certain date. There was a further condition that if the money was not repaid on that date the creditor could enter into possession of the plaintiff's cultivatory holding as a usufructuary mortgagee. It is admitted that this latter covenant was contrary to the provisions of the Tenancy Act and illegal. The plaintiff sued for a simple money decree for the amount advanced by him. The defence was that the whole contract was illegal within the meaning of section 24 of the Contract Act and that the plaintiff could get no decree. Two judgments of this Court were cited before the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court. Neither of them has been reported except in Indian Cases. One of the rulings is in favour of the plaintiff, the other in favour of the defendants. Under these circumstances it seems desirable that the question of law involved should be decided by a Bench and I direct that this application be laid before a Bench.

When the case came up before a Bench of two judges the following judgment was delivered :—

Walsh, J.—We are both satisfied with the judgment of the Small Cause Court Judge which is an admirable one, and the case is really covered by the decision of the late Sir Sunder Lal in the case of Muhammad Shakur v. Gopi (1) which the learned Judge has followed. S. A. No. 518 of 1922, Decided on 1st June 1923 against the decree of the First Addl. Dt. J., Aligarh, D/- 27th February 1922.

Pre-emption—Suit for—Strangers joined in respect of a portion of the property—Claim in respect of whole fails.

M. L. Agarwala and Gulzari Lal—for Appellant.

S. N. Sen—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Suit for pre-emption. On the 7th January 1920 the 2nd and 3rd defendants sold to the 1st defendant who is the appellant here certain property situated in two mahals, Gobind Ram and Bagi Manda. The sale of these items of property was made by one deed.

Five plaintiffs brought a suit to pre-empt this sale; of these, plaintiffs 1, 2 and 3 had no share in Mahal. Bagi Manda. Plaintiffs 4 and 5 had shares in both Mahals. At the time of the purchase the vendee had no share in either Mahal and this was the state of affairs at the time the suit was brought.

During the pendency of the suit the vendee got a transfer made in his favour of certain property situated in both the Mahals. This transfer purported to be by way of gift. The Court of first instance however held that the transfer was not in reality a gift but was in fact a sale and this view has been affirmed in appeal by the lower appellate Court.

The result of the suit in the Court of first instance was that the plaintiff's claim was dismissed entirely with respect to the property situated in Mahal Bagi Manda. The Munsif found that the plaintiffs 4 and 5 had, by associating with them in their claim, strangers to the property in Mahal Bagi Manda, disqualified themselves from obtaining any decree for pre-emption in respect of this property. We have already adverted to the fact that the 1st, 2nd and 3rd plaintiffs had no share in Mahal Bag Manda.

The Munsif gave a decree to all five plaintiffs for pre-emption of the property situated in Mahal Gobind Ram.

This decree of the Court of first instance has been affirmed in appeal by the learned District Judge.

It is complained in second appeal that the learned Judge did not decide all the points which were raised before him. In fact the only question which the learned Judge has decided is that the transfer which was made in favour of the vendee during the pendency of this suit was a transfer by way of sale and not by way of gift.

The first plea of which we take notice is contained in paragraph 2 of the memorandum of appeal. The learned Counsel has contended that the suit ought to have been dismissed on the ground that no suit for partial pre-emption is maintainable.

We are of opinion that this plea ought to succeed so far as the 4th and 5th plaintiffs are concerned.

By joining in the suit persons who were strangers to the property situated in Mahal Bagi Manda these plaintiffs disqualified themselves from suing for pre-emption of the property in that Mahal and as under the law they must pre-empt the whole sale and as they have disqualified themselves from doing so, in our opinion, their suit must fail entirely.

This consideration however does not apply in the case of the plaintiffs 1, 2 and 3. They could only claim pre-emption of the property situated in Mahal Gobind Ram and this they have done.

It is next pleaded in paragraph 3 of the memorandum of appeal that there is no sufficient proof of custom. That question has not really been argued before us and indeed it appears to us that no argument is possible in view of the provisions of the wajib-ul arz upon which the first Court relied. We are satisfied that a custom of pre-emption does exist.

As regards the argument that the whole suit should be dismissed we have already expressed our opinion that the claim of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd plaintiff's cannot be dismissed on the facts as they stand. Further it is to be observed that the appellant, the vendee, cannot succeed on the law as laid down by this Court. He has been found by both Courts to have taken a transfer by way of sale during the pendency of the suit. He has not acquired an indefeasible title to the property by this transfer and in fact a suit for pre-emption in respect of this transfer was filed before the Munsif gave his decision. At the time of the first Court's decree the appellant had no complete title and was therefore not in a position to claim the status of a co-sharer. He was in short only a stranger and under the custom as set out in the wajib-ul-arz the plaintiffs have a right of pre-emption as against him in respect of the property situated in Mahal Gobind Ram.

This view of the law has been taken in the case reported in 4 A. L. J. 351. affirming the decision of Richards, J., which is reported as Kauleshar Rai v. Nabihan Bibi (1).

This ruling has been followed in other decisions of this Court and we need only refer to a decision of the present Bench dated 20th April 1923 in second Appeal 1446 of 1921.

The result of all this is that we modify the decree of the Court below by directing that the claim of the plaintiffs 4 and 5 be dismissed in respect of Mahal Gobind Ram as against the defendant appellant with proportionate costs in all Courts. The decree in favour of the plaintiffs 1, 2 and 3 with respect to Mahal Gobind Ram will remain and to this extent the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs to the plaintiffs-respondents 1, 2 and 3.

We may mention here that the order of the first Court dismissing the suit as regards Mahal Bagi Manda has become final and no appeal was filed against that order in the Court below.

Appeal allowed in part.

S. A. No. 1167 of 1921, Decided on 8th June, 1923, from a decree of the Second Addl. J., Gorakhpur, D/-6th May, 1921.

Pre-emption—Right to sue—right to pre-empt must exist on date of sale, date of suit and date of first Court's decree.

A plaintiff pre-emptor, in order to be able to maintain a suit for pre-emption, must establish his right to pre-empt on three important dates viz., the date of sale, the date on which the suit is brought and the date on which the case was disposed of by the first Court. The subsequent loss of the share by the plaintiff i. e., his ceasing to be co-sharer, in no way affects the right he possessed at the time when the decree in his favour ought to have been passed by the first Court. [P. 83 C. 1, d]

M. L Agarwala and L. N. Tewari—for Appellant.

Haribans Sahai—for Respondent.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The main plea taken on behalf of the defendant was that the plaintiff had no preference over him. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit on the 24th July 1920. On appeal the lower appellate Court was of opinion that under the custom recorded in the wajib-ul-arz the plaintiff had a right of preference as against the defendant vendee though the latter was a co-sharer in the same thok. The decree of the first Court was accordingly set aside and the suit decreed. A second appeal was preferred to this Court on the 28th July 1921 and one of the grounds raised in the memorandum of appeal was that inasmuch as the plaintiff respondent had ceased to be a co-sharer at the time of the lower appellate Court's decree his suit should have been dismissed.

An affidavit was filed in support of the allegation implied in that ground and time was given to the opposite party to file a counter affidavit if necessary. No such affidavit was filed.

We may therefore take it that it is the appellant's case that on the 20th April 1921 the share of the plaintiff pre-emptor, on the strength of which he had instituted the suit, was sold at auction and purchased by a third party. This sale was subsequently confirmed and a sale certificate of a later date was issued a certified copy of which is produced along with the affidavit. We may therefore take it that the plaintiff respondent ceased to be a co-sharer on the 20th April 1921. This however was a date subsequent to the date of the first Court's decree. But we would like to note that although the auction purchase had taken place before the passing of the decree of the lower appellate Court the fact was never brought to the notice of that Court.

It is well settled law that a plaintiff pre-emptor in order to be able to maintain a suit for pre-emption must establish his right to pre-empt on three important dates. He must have a right of pre-emption at the time when the sale took place otherwise he would have no cause of action at all. He must also have the same right at the time when the suit is brought or else he would have no locus standi to sue. A possible view to take might have been that nothing which happens after the institution of a suit can alter the position of the parties. But it has been held in a number of cases by this Court that it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that his right to pre-empt continues up to the date when the decree ought to have been passed in his favour, namely, the date on which the case was disposed of by the first Court. It matters little whether the Court of first instance did actually dismiss or decree his suit. The date of that Court's decree is the date on which, if the plaintiff's contention is correct, the decree ought to have been passed in his favour. This principle was the basis of the decision in the following cases:—

Ram Gopal v. Piari Lal, (1) Bhagwan Das v. Mohan Lal (2) Rohan Singh v. Bhau Lal (3) & Shankar Lal v. Karari Mal (4) recently decided by this Bench. The last crucial date in such cases must therefore be taken to be the date of the first Court's decree. If subsequent events were allowed to alter the form of the decree it would lead to much confusion. It is impossible to hold that having regard to the position of the parties as it stood on the date of the first Court's decree any other decree could have been passed on that date. Furthermore, an appellate Court cannot take into account these subsequent events without admitting fresh evidence in appeal, which may not always be permissible.

We are therefore of opinion that the subsequent loss of the share by the plaintiff in no way affects the right he possessed at the time when the decree in his favour ought to have been passed by the first Court.

The other grounds taken in the memorandum of appeal have not been seriously pressed. The result therefore is that the appeal fails and is hereby dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

J. M. Banerjee and Nihal Chand for Appellant.

L. M. Banerjee—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The order passed by the Court below is irregular and cannot be sustained. In a suit for the recovery of money due on a mortgage made by Maharaj Prasad, the mortgagor, Maharaj Prasad was examined and in the course of his deposition he made certain statements in regard to which the Court below has directed his prosecution. The main question for consideration in that case was whether the mortgage in question was made for legal necessity. Various questions were put to him about certain other transactions about which he made replies which he had subsequently to modify on a certain account, Exhibit 3 being shown to him. The Court below was of opinion that in saying what he did Maharaj Prasad had deliberately made false statements. But as pointed out in Lachhami Narain v. King Emperor (1) a witness is entitled to locus penitentiae and an opportunity to correct himself and if, when he gets that opportunity; he recalls to his mind any fact about which he had made a statement which was not quite accurate, a prosecution for perjury will hardly be desirable. No statement made by a witness in a deposition can be regarded as completed statement until the deposition is finished and corrected, if necessary, for till then it is open to the witness to qualify any statement or to correct it himself, as this man seems to have done, when he was confronted with a certain account. The statements relied on were moreover, statements hardly material to the issue before the Court. The order for prosecution does not specify those statements, but refers to another rulekar, where in a reference is made to them. Considering all the circumstances no useful purpose can be served by allowing the prosecution to proceed. The order of the Court below is therefore set aside and the proceedings, if any, started in pursuance thereof will be quashed.

The applicants were not represented.

Assistant Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Referring Order.—This is an application for revision in connection with an order passed by the Honorary Magistrate of Sasni under S. 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The facts are as follows:—A complaint was filed against the applicants Chunni Lal and Indra, as well as two others, under Ss. 447 and 323 of the Indian Penal Code. It was alleged that the two applicants had been lawfully ejected from certain fields, but that in spite of the ejectment they still continued to cultivate the fields and when the complainant remonstrated with them, they ordered the other two accused to give him a beating. On October the 18th, 1922 the two applicants were convicted under S. 447 and fined Rs. 5/- each. But the Honorary Magistrate disbelieved the story of any beating, and held that only an altercation had taken place. There was, therefore, no conviction under S. 323, and the other two accused were acquitted,

On October the 24th the complainant filed an application before the Court under S. 522, and on December the 14th, 1922 the Honorary Magistrate allowed this application and passed orders directing delivery of possession of the fields to the complainant.

I have heard and considered the arguments of both parties in this matter. It has deen pointed out that the action of the two applicants in still retaining possession of the fields, in spite of their conviction under S. 447, amounts to a species of contempt of Court. It has been suggested that the two applicants being admittedly rank trespassers are entitled to no consideration at the hands of the Court. They did not even appeal against their conviction under S. 447. I have also been asked to consider what is likely to happen if possession is restored to the two applicants the suggestion being that a riot is likely to take place over the crops standing in the fields. It seems to me however, that if any violence is likely to be used at all, it is just as likely to be used if possession is not restored to the applicants, as it seems clear, from the arguments before me, that the standing crops must have been sown by the applicants themselves. The applicants urge that these crops are worth Rs. 400 though this is no doubt a considerable exaggeration.

I do not think, however, that I am at present concerned with any of the above matters. The question is whether or not the order passed by the Honorary Magistrate was a legal one. There are many rulings to the effect that an essential ingredient of S. 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is that the offence of which the person concerned is convicted must have been attended by criminal force, or, at the very least, by the show of criminal force. An almost parallel case is to be found in fact in 25 All. 341. It is impossible to go behind the finding of the Honorary Magistrate himself to the effect that no offence under S. 323 of the Indian Penal Code was committed, and that an altercation was all that took place. In the circumstances I am of opinion that S. 522 did not apply, and that the order passed was, therefore an illegal one. Two remedies were open to the complainant; he could either have filed another complaint under S. 447 against the applicants, or else he could have sued for their ejectment in the Civil Court. What was not open to him was to apply for delivery of possession under S. 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Under S. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure this case will accordingly be reported for the orders of the Hon'ble High Court, with the recommendation that the order passed by the Honorary Magistrate under S. 522 should be set aside, and that possession should be ordered to be restored to the two appellants.

Judgment

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—The learned District Magistrate finds that the applicants Chunni Lal and Indra were convicted of an offence under S. 447 of the Indian Penal Code by reason of their having continued to cultivate certain fields in spite of their ejectment and that there was nothing to indicate that the offence of criminal trespass was attended by the use of criminal force. S. 522, Cr. P. C. cannot on these facts apply and the order of the learned Honorary Magistrate directing the delivery of possession of the fields in question with the crop standing thereon to the complainant cannot be sustained. The reference is therefore accepted and the order of the Honorary Magistrate passed under S. 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is set aside. It is open to the complainant to seek any other remedy open to him in the manner provided by law. Let the record be returned.

Gayan Singh—Plaintiff—Appellant

v.

Babu Lal and another—Defendants-Respondents.

F. A. No. 148 of 1921, Decided on 13th July, 1923, from the decree of the First Addl. Sub. J., Aligarh, D/-3rd January, 1921.

Pre-emption—Custom—A mere resident can pre-empt.

A person who is merely a resident of the village and is neither a co-sharer nor a relation of the vendor can pre-empt if the wajib-ul-arz so provides; such a custom is not necessarily unreasonable.

S. N. Sen and P. L. Banerjee—for Appellant.

Panna Lal—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption in respect of a sale deed dated the 27th February 1919 executed by the defendant No. 2 in favour of Babu Lal defendant No. 1. The plaintiff frankly confessed that he was neither a co-sharer in the village nor a relation of the vendor. His claim was based entirely on the ground that he was a resident (bashinda) of the village Mahwat in which the property sold was situated, It was alleged that there was a custom prevailing in this village under which, in case co-sharers refused to pre-empt, the right of pre-emption was given to residents of the village.

In the written statement the defendant vendee admitted paragraph 1 of the plaint which had stated that the plaintiff was a resident of the village in question It was however disputed that there was any such custom in existence. The plaintiff's allegation as to the incorrect recital of the sale consideration was also challenged.

The learned Subordinate Judge framed several issues, issues Nos. 2 and 3 of which directed to the question whether a custom of pre-emption in favour of a mere resident, who was not a co-sharer, was proved or could be enforced in law. He came to the conclusion that no such custom had been established by the evidence produced in this case and that in any case such a custom would be uncertain and unreasonable and therefore incapable of being enforced by a Court of law. He accordingly dismissed the suit without going into the question of the correct price of the disputed property.

The plaintiff has come up in appeal to this Court and on his behalf the findings are challenged.

The evidence produced in support of the custom consisted of a wajib-ul-arz of the year 1871, paragraph 15 of which contains the following recital:—

"If a share-holder wants to sell his property he should sell it first to his near co-sharer and in case he does not take it, then he should sell it to other co-sharer and if he also does not take it then he should sell it to the inhabitants of the village. In case no co-sharer and no inhabitant of the village takes it, the vendor has power to sell it to any one he may like. The rate of value will be according to the quality of the share. If any co-sharer, in order to deprive the nearer co-sharer fraudulently declares an excessive amount of price, then the matter relating to the proper amount of consideration would be settled by private partition or under an order of the officer and the amount would be caused to be given".

This wajib ul-arz was verified on the 8th September 1871 when the Board's circular No. 24 of 1868 was in force In paragraph 9 of this circular there was a direction that the wajib-ul-arz should be a record of custom and usages prevalent in the district. It is apparent that an entry relating to a right of pre-emption in the inhabitants of the village could not in all probability have been a record of contract. Inhabitants who were not co-sharers in the village were no parties to the wajib-ul-arz; and it is not likely that co-sharers would enter into a contract with them. Either, therefore, this entry was an entry of a custom prevailing in this village or it was a useless entry made at the desire of attesting co-sharers. It has been laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Digambar Singh v. Ahmad Sayeed

Khan (1) that an entry in a wajib-zl-arz is prima facie evidence of the existence of a custom. Unless, therefore, there is anything in the wajib-ul-arz itself which negatives the idea of such an existence or there is other evidence to the contrary or such custom is unreasonable and unenforceable the presumption would be that such a custom exists.

Another piece of evidence relied upon in the Court below was a judgment of the District Judge of Aligarh dated the 9th of May 1917. That was a suit arising out of a sale of a share in another village, Pans, which however is situated in the same parganah Etah Sakit Tahsil and district Etah where the property in the present suit is situated. There the plaintiff was not a co sharer at all, but was a blacksmith. The learned District Judge in allowing the appeal remarked that it was contended by the counsel for the respondent that the custom was unreasonable inasmuch as Bale the plaintiff pre-emptor was an artisan. He could not see anything unreasonable in the custom and saw no reason why a neighbour residing in the same village should not be given preference to one outsider, nor did he consider the fact, that no recent exercise of the right of pre-emption had taken place, to have any bearing on the case. In this view he allowed the appeal and decreed the suit.

The defendant vendee filed an appeal to this Court which was numbered as S. A. 1111 of 1917 and was disposed of by the pre-emption bench on the 15th January 1918, the judgment and decree of the District Judge being confirmed. It is apparent that on that occasion at least both the District Judge and this Court did not consider that such a custom was so unreasonable as not to be enforcible in a Court of law. This litigation, as it related to another village, is of value for this purpose only,

So far as we can find there has been only one recent sale in this village, on which according to the oral evidence Ram Sarup a co-sharer did bring a suit and got a decree. That circumstance neither helps the present plaintiff, nor does it in any way negative the existence of the custom relied upon by him,

It has been strongly contended that the custom set up is unreasonable and should not be enforced. A custom of pre-emption may either prevail in a certain locality or may govern a particular community. In the present case the plaintiff's case is that this custom governs the community which consists of the residents of a village and it prevails in the area which is defined by that village. Such a custom has once, at least, been enforced in the neighbourhood. We do not think such a custom is necessarily unreasonable or unenforcible. For the enforcement of a right of pre-emption under a custom it is not necessary that the pre-emptor should be a proprietor. In numerous cases the right of a mere relation to enforce a custom has been recognized by the Courts.

The last point urged in support of the decree was that it had not been established that the plaintiff was a resident in that very mahal, in which the share sold was situated. This was a question of fact which ought to have been raised in the Court below. The plaintiff's residence in the village was admitted in the written statement and no plea was raised that he was not a person who came within the expression bashindgan village as recited in the wajib-ul-arz. We think that this question of fact should not now be allowed to be raised.

As the learned Sudordinate Judge has disposed of the suit on a preliminary ground only and we are not prepared to uphold his finding, we allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the case for disposal of the suit by decision of issue No. 4. Issue No. 1 has already been disposed of by implication. Costs here and hitherto will be costs in the cause and will abide the result. Costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed ; Case remanded.

Judgment.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal arising out of a suit for recovery of possession as reversioners of Sarjiwan Lal the alleged last male owner. It was the plaintiffs' case that Sarjiwan Lal who was a separated Hindu died many years ago and on his death Mt. Dulari his widow entered into possession of his estate, that she made a transfer of the property in dispute without any legal necessity in the year 1911 to Chait Ram who in his turn on the 15th of March 1917 sold it to the defendant respondent; that Mt. Dulari died within twelve years of the suit and the plaintiffs are entitled to possession.

On behalf of the contesting defendant it was denied that Dulari's husband Sarjiwan Lal was separate from his other brothers, and it was further pleaded that Mt. Dulari without any right and title had entered into possession and remained in adverse possession for more than twelve years and had acquired title to the property absolutely. It was also pleaded that in any case there was legal necessity for the transfer.

The learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the evidence was insufficient to establish that Sarjiwan Lal had separated from his brothers at the time of his death. He found that Mt. Dulari had entered into adverse possession and that therefore the plaintiffs' claim was barred by time. On the question of legal necessity he found that the defendant had failed to establish it. The suit however was dismissed on the finding that the family had been joint.

In appeal it is contended that it is proved that Sarjiwan Lal was a separated Hindu and further that even assuming that he was joint with his brothers, Musammat Dulari's possession in consequence of her own admissions was never adverse and that at best she only acquired a Hindu widow's estate.

On the question of jointness or separation the documentary evidence is practically nil The earliest document which we have on the point is an application dated the 21st of March 1896 filed by Mt Dulari in the Revenue Court for a perfect partition of her share which was described as being 20 out of 54 shares in a 5 biswas share of the mahal. On the 21st of May 1896 another application on behalf of Hori Lal was also presented desiring partition. These applications were resisted by an objection dated the 28th May 1896 filed by Mt. Mano Kunwar on behalf of Kirpa Shanker and Bodh Raj. In this objection she asserted that the family had all along remained joint and that Mt. Dulari had no right to possession or to have any share separated This objection does not appear to have been pressed at all and was ultimately disallowed. The Revenue Court apparently directed the partition to be effected and Mt. Dulari's share was actually separated. Afterwards we find that on the 20th December 1898 Mt. Dulari executed a mortgage deed in favour of Maharaj Tika Ram in which she stated that the property mortgaged had belonged to her husband and was in her possession but that she was the owner of it. The amount borrowed was taken partly in order to pay off a bond of the 5th April 1897 said to have been executed in order to meet the expenses of the Revenue Court litigation as well as for cash received at the time of registration. On the 26th April 1903 she executed a second mortgage deed in favour of the same Tika Ram in order to pay off the amount due on the previous mortgage deed of 1898 as well as some parole debts due to the mortgagee and for a further advance in order to meet certain miscellaneous debts and expenses of her food. These mortgage deeds remained unchallenged for a large number of years.

On the 13th February 1911 she executed a sale deed of the entire share in this village in favour of Chaitram for a sum of Rs. 2000. The amount was said to have been required in order to pay off the earlier mortgage deed as well as some previous debts and there was a further advance of Rs. 1200. In this sale deed she did state that the property sold was the zamindari property left by her husband. As we have already said, this was followed by the sale deed of the 15th of March 1917 which is the subject matter of dispute in this case. We can find nothing in any of these documents which would necessarily show that her husband at the time when he died had been separate from his brothers. The mere fact that the widow's name is entered in the revenue papers does not in our opinion necessarily raise the presumption that she is the widow of a separated Hindu.

Coming to the oral evidence adduced by the plaintiffs we find that that evidence too is not reliable. The learned Subordinate Judge who heard the witnesses did not believe them. The first witness is Pitambar Das who stated that all the brothers of Sarjiwan Lal lived separately. They were separate in mess, business, house and everything. He admits however that he is by relationship connected with the plaintiffs and that this alleged separation must have taken place prior to his attaining the age of discretion. It is admitted that all these brothers lived in one and the same house, some living in the upper storey and some in the lower storey. There is nothing to show that the names of these brothers were separately entered during their life-time against the zamindari property owned by them. This witness in cross-examination stated that it was 5, 6, 8 or 10 years after Sarjiwan Lal's death that the name of Mt. Dulari was entered in the revenue papers.

If this statement were to be accepted it would follow that she could not have got her name entered by right as the widow of a separated Hindu.

The next witness is Hazari Lal whose statement in examination-in chief was to the same effect, but in cross-examination he too admitted that Sarjiwan Lal and his brothers did not separate in his presence ; that they did not divide the amount of profits in his presence, and that they lived in separate portions of one and the same house. Balkishun one of the brothers lived in the upper storey and the other brothers in the lower storey. The remaining three brothers also lived in the upper storey. This witness also is related to the plaintiffs by family relationship and was not considered an independent witness by the Court below.

The third witness Kishun Narain also stated in a general way that the brothers of Sarjiwan Lal were separate from each other. In cross-examination he had to admit that he did not know who used to make the collections in respect of the zamindari property.

The fourth witness Gauri Prasad in cross-examination stated that as far as he knew Sarjiwan Lal and his brothers did no work except collecting rents from the zamindari property; that Sarjiwan Lal and his brothers did not divide the income in his presence and that Mt. Dulari obtained possession of the estate not on Sarjiwan Lal's death but on the death of Inderjit; that Inderjit died 20 or 22 years ago and as long as he was alive he himself was in possession of the property and it was he who used to give money to Mt Dulari. If this statement of the plaintiff's, own witness is to be believed it wouldd estroy the plaintiff's case and would show that Mt. Dulari never obtained possession as a Hindu widow as long as the surviving brother Inderjit was alive; that it was somehow or other after Inderjit's death that she obtained possession of the property.

The last witness on the point is Murad Lal who stated that he had seen Inderjit and Dulari separate since 1878 but in cross-examination he admitted that he saw Inderjit and Dulari separate in mess only and in no other way. It is admitted by the other witnesses that all the branches of the family lived in one and the same house.

It is true that the oral evidence produced by the defendant is even worse. Banke Lal who was only 56 years of age stated that he had seen Sarjiwan Lal and Inderjit and found them living and dining together. He stated that he himself used to live and dine with them. In cross-examination however he could not fix the exact date. He had said originally that he was appointed patwari in 1875 and that he was living in the house of Inderjit in 1877 or 1878. In cross-examination though he repeated this statement yet he said that during the days when he was living with Sarjiwan Lal he was not a patwari at all. His statement was to the effect that Dulari lived separate from Inderjit and that it was after the death of Sarjiwan that she became separate and that she was separate also as regards food etc.

The only other witness is one Abdul Hafiz who himself has no personal knowledge of the matter.

There can be no doubt that the presumption of law was in favour of the jointness of all the four brothers. The plaintiffs who came into Court on the allegation that they were separate, had to establish it by clear and cogent evidence. The documentary evidence, we have already pointed out, is altogether inconclusive. The oral evidence also is, under the circumstances suggested above, altogether unreliable. In this view of the matter we find it impossible to differ from the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the four brothers were separate.

It is however contended on behalf of the appellants that even assuming that the four brothers were joint, the possession of Mt. Dulari was never adverse. Reliance is placed on the statement contained in the mortgage deed of 1898 and the sale deed of 1911 to the effect that the property transferred had been acquired by the lady from her deceased husband. Although those statements profess to show the origin of her title, it does not follow that these statements necessarily imply that at that time she was not asserting her full ownership but was only putting forward a limited interest in the estate. In 1896 when she applied for partition there was no admission on her behalf that she was only a limited owner. The evidence as to when and how she obtained possession is practically nil. Some of the plaintiff's own witnesses have stated that she entered into possession many years after Sarjiwan Lal's death. One witness going so far as to say that she obtained possession after Inderjit's death. Under these circumstances, we are bound to hold that there is absolutely nothing to show how she originally obtained possession of the estate and when and how her name was entered in the revenue papers. All that we know is that in the year 1896 she was a co-sharer when she applied for partition in the Revenue Court as against the other co-sharers. From this conduct of hers no inference can be drawn one way or the other. The subsequent admissions also are not conclusive on the point. It was laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Lachhan Kunwar v. Manorath Ram (1). "That unless it was clearly shown that when the widow took possession she professed to do it as claiming only the limited estate of a widow it would be impossible to hold that the rights of the other claimants were not extinguished".

In the present case, we have already said, there is nothing whatsoever to show how she got into possession. It may be that she got into possession claiming adverse title to the estate or it may be that she obtained possession surreptitiously or with the consent of the other members. So long however as the plaintiffs have not shown that she entered into possession of the estate with an assertion of only a limited interest it seems to us impossible to hold that her possession had all along remained either permissive or qualified. Her subsequent conduct, namely, the execution of the mortgage deeds, would rather go to show that she was all along treating herself as full owner of the property. The case of Satgur Prasad v. Raj Kishore Lal (2) is somewhat similar inasmuch as in that case there were also a number of admissions of Mt. Dilla Kunwari that she had acquired the property as heir to her husband. These admissions however were not taken to necessarily involve the legal inference that she was asserting only a limited interest and not her absolute right. The learned vakil for the appellants relies on the case of Baijnath Prasad v. Tej Bali Singh (3) in particular on the observations made by one of the learned Judges at page 946. That case however was quite a different one. There the lady was not in possession of the property as a trespasser but only asserted a Hindu widow's estate. As was pointed out by the learned Chief Justice at page 936 her possession could be legally explained on the basis of a will by her late husband as well as on the basis of custom set up in the case. When the case went up in appeal to their Lordships of the Privy Council the question of adverse possession was altogether dropped. That case therefore is in our opinion no authority for the contention advanced on behalf of the appellants.

The result therefore is that in our opinion the lady must be deemed to have remained in adverse possession of the property for more than twelve years and as having asserted her full ownership. Under these circumstances the plaintiff's claim is barred by limitation. The appeal accordingly fails and is hereby dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Balgobind Misra and another—Plaintiffs—Respondents.

S. A. No. 1803 of 1921, Decided on 22nd June, 1923, from a decree of the Dt. J., Benares, D/- 21st July 1921.

Agra Tenancy Act, S. 9-Applies even to disputes to which landlord is not a party—Presumption under S. 9 can be displaced by subsequent events.

Sulaiman, J.—S, 9 in terms is not confined to a dispute between landlord and tenant. The words "as against a landlord" are not there at all. The section is quite general in its scope and is applicable to all cases where a dispute as to the nature of the tenancy arises, no matter whether that dispute arises against a landlord or not. A dispute may very well arise between the rival heirs of a deceased tenant and the question of the true nature of the tenancy may have to be decided in a litigation to which the landlord is no party. In such a case it is not open to either set of these heirs to go behind the entry at the last revision of records and adduce evidence to the contrary. The presumption under S. 9 is conclusive. The only way to displace it is by producing a judicial decision in proceedings instituted before the Act, and in no other way. From this it does not, however, follow that there is a conclusive presumption under the section for all time to come that the true nature of the lands is of a certain nature. The presumption can only be that the lands were of that kind at the time when the entry was made. There is no presumption that the nature of those lands can never in future be altered and therefore evidence can be allowed to show that a new position has arisen since the settlement. 34 A. 285 (F. Lindsay, J.—The scope of S 9 is strictly limited. The rule laid down in that section can only be applied in litigation arising between a landlord and tenant when the matter in issue between the landlord and tenant is the nature of a tenancy, 34 All, 285 (F.B.) Foll, [P 93 C 2]

M. A. Aziz—for Appellants.

N. C. Vaish—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a defendants appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The vendor Gaya was a zamindar of patti Subhao. He executed two sale-deeds in favour of defendants Nos 2 and 3 and defendant No.7 respectively. Under the first sale-deed he purported to sell his 2 annas and 8 pies share in the patti, and under the second a number of plots specified therein as fixed-rate holdings. The defendants 2 and 3 are the sons of Sheo Nandan defendant No. 1, and defendant No. 7 is his wife. The plaintiffs brought this suit to pre-empt both these transfers on the allegation that they together constituted one transaction in favour of the defendant's family. There was also some dispute as to the actual sale consideration. The plaintiffs alleged that they were co-sharers in the same patti with the vendor and under the custom prevailing in the mahal they were entitled to pre-empt the sale.

On behalf of the defendants the existence of the custom of pre-emption was denied; it was pleaded that the sale considerations were truly entered in the two documents and that these were separate transactions. It was further pleaded that the plaintiffs were precluded under the provisions of S. 9 of the Agra Tenancy Act from saying that the plots were not fixed-rate holdings but zamindari properties; and that there being no custom for pre-emption with respect to tenancy holdings the claim with respect to these plots was not maintainable.

The Court of first instance decreed the claim holding that there was a custom of pre-emption in the village, that the fixed-rate tenancies had become proprietary interests and were liable to pre emption. On appeal the learned District Judge accepted the findings of the Court of first instance and dismissed the appeal.

As there has been some dispute with regard to the constitution of this mahal I think it desirable to mention the following facts.

In the settlement of 1881 the plots mentioned in the plaint were recorded as fixed-rate holdings of Subhao's family. In the year 1893 there was a perfect partition of the entire village which was divided into three distinct mahals. Mahal Bishen Dayal consisted of 5 pattis 3 of which were real (asli) pattis, the other 2 being shamlat pattis. The evidence of the patwari, supported by the entries in the khewat and the khatauni, which are not contradicted by any other evidence makes it quite clear that all the fixed-rate holdings belonging to Subhao's family were at the partition placed in patti Subhao of which Subhao's family was the sole proprietor. The effect of the partition therefore was that the fixed rate tenants ceased to be the tenants of the other co-parceners of the mahal, and all their fixed-rate holdings were included in their own patti. The legal consequence of such a change obviously was to bring about a merger, a complete absorption of the fixed-rate tenancies into zamindari rights. After the partition of 1893, therefore, there can be no doubt that in the eye of the law the fixed-rate hoidings ceased to exist. The rights and interests of the owners were only those of ordinary proprietors. It is admitted however, that in the khatauni these plots continued to be recorded as fixed-rate holdings.

The contention on behalf of the defendant appellant is that it is not open to the plaintiffs to show by any evidence that these plots are other than fixed-rate holdings. Strong reliance is placed on S. 9 of the Agra Tenancy Act and the argument is that so long as the revenue papers have not been actually corrected the presumption is absolutely conclusive that these plots are fixed-rate holdings to the present day. S 9 in terms is not confined to a dispute between landlord and tenant. The words "as against a landlord" are not there at all. The section is quite general in its scope and is applicable to all cases where dispute as to the nature of the tenancy arises, no matter whether that dispute arises against a landlord or not.

It is conceivable that such a dispute may arise in proceedings to which the landlord is not at all a party. Under S. 20 (1) of the Tenancy Act the interest of a permanent tenure holder or of a fixed-rate tenant is heritable according to his personal law. Whereas other tenancies devolve according to the rule laid down in S. 22. A dispute may very well arise between the rival heirs of a deceased tenant and the question of the true nature of the tenancy may have to be decided in a litigation to which the landlord is no party. Is t open to either set of these heirs to go behind the entry at the last revision of records and adduce evidence to the contrary? In my judgment the legislature intended that this should not be allowed The presumption under S. 9 is conclusive. The only way to displace it is by producing a judicial decision in proceedings instituted before the Act, and in no other way From this it does not, however, follow that there is a conclusive presumption under the section for all time to come that the true nature of the lands is that of a fixed-rate tenancy. The presumption can only be that the lands were fixed-rate tenancies at the time when the entry was made. There is no presumption that the nature of those lands can never in future be altered

There are many ways in which fixed-rate tenancies may come to an end e.g., by surrender, ejectment, express agreement with the landlord, or, as in this case, by merger. I cannot therefore see how one can shut out evidence directed to show that a new position has arisen since the settlement. It has been suggested in argument that so long as the entries in the revenue papers remain uncorrected the presumption continues. But how can a correction be ever made after the coming into force of the Act? Whenever the Courts are moved for making the correction, the presumption, according to the appellant's contention, must stand in the way.

The Full Bench in the case of Jai Nath Pathak v. Kalka Upadhya (1) did not mean to lay down anything more than that "the entry mentioned in S. 9 is conclusive proof only as to the nature of the tenancy," and not as to the title to it; or, to be more exact, whether the person recorded was a permanent tenure holder, or a fixed-rate tenant or not.

(1) [1912] 34 All. 285—9 A.L.J. 238—13 I.C. 643 (F. B)

I must presume conclusively that in 1881 these plots were fixed-rate holdings, but I am of opinion that there is nothing in S. 9 which precludes a Court from going into the question whether the effect of subsequent events has or has not been to alter its nature. As I have already stated the effect of the partition of 1893, was to bring about a complete merger by which the fixed rate holdings were destroyed and absorbed into zamindari rights. After that the owners became full proprietors. This is the finding of the learned District Judge, which in my opinion is fatal to this appeal. The plaintiffs clearly had a right to pre-empt the sale, as the custom of pre-emption exists in the village, and the property sold was a proprietary interest in the mahal. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

Liddsay, J:—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed but I wish to add a few words regarding the argument based upon S. 9 of the Tenancy Act. In my opinion that section could not be used in the present case for the purpose of defeating the claim of the plaintiff pre-emptor. It seems to me that the scope of S. 9 is strictly limited and that the rule laid down in that section can only be applied in litigation arising between a landlord and tenant when the matter in issue between the landlord and tenant is the nature of a tenancy.

The Tenancy Act only professes to regulate litigation regarding agricultural tenancies and in that view, it seems to me, we ought to limit the scope of a section such as S. 9 and ought not to assume that it was the intention of the legislature to lay down a rule which should be of universal application so as to govern the legal relations of persons who do not stand inter se as landlord and tenant.

The Full Bench case of this Court reported in 34 All. 285 seems to me to be the clearest possible authority for this view [Jai Nath Pathak v. Kalka (1)] That ruling to my mind lays down that S. 9 can only be had recourse to in cases of dispute between a zamindar and his tenant as to the nature of the tenancy and the section was framed for the purpose of providing a rule of evidence which should govern the decision of such cases. It is clearly laid dawn in the ruling in question that the entry mentioned in section 9 is conclusive proof only as to the nature of the tenancy. In the present case no question as to the nature of tenancy arises between a landlord and his tenant. The plaintiff does not stand in the relation of landlord to the defendant appellant who is the purchaser of this property. I hold therefore that S. 9 could not be applied to the facts of the present case in order to show that the plaintiff had no right of pre-emption and that the property was still a fixed-rate tenancy and not the zamindari property of the person who sold it.

By the Court:— The order of the Court is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil P. C., O. 32 R. 3—Major wrongly described as minor is not a material defect.

P. L. Banerjee—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—Second Appeals Nos. 40 of 1922 and 144 of 1922 are connected appeals and arise out of two suits for pre-emption. On the 27th February 1919 one Anant Ram executed a sale-deed of certain shares in mauza Pawaoli in favour of Hukum Chand. Sukhdeo and Rup Singh defendants vendees. On the 25th February 1920 Har Gobind who was a co-sharer in the village instituted a suit No. 149 of 1920 for pre-emption of this property. This was followed by another suit instituted on the 27th February 1920 by Ram Dial, Bansidhar and Jagram, numbered as suit No. 159 of 1920. The two plaintiffs, Bansidhar and Jagram, have since withdrawn from the suit. These two suits were instituted in the Court of the Munsif.

A third suit was instituted in the Court of the Subordinate Judge by Ram Dial the second but we do not know the date on which it was filed. Ram Dial the second was impleaded in the two suits first mentioned but the plaintiffs of those suits were not impleaded in the suit by Ram Dial the second. The first two suits were dismissed by the Munsif on the 15th of September 1920 and the third suit was decreed on the 10th of August 920.

The Munsif dismissed the plaintiffs suit on the ground that both sets of plaintiffs had notice of the sale and had refused to purchase the property. In the Court of the Munsif Ram Dial the second, who was the plaintiff in the third suit, was impleaded as a pro-forma defendant He was originally alleged to be a minor and an application was made that he should be brought on the record under the guardianship of his mother. Ram Dial the second however appeared in both the suits and stated that he was of age. The Court of first instance went into the question of his minority and found that he was of age. Ram Dial the second was actually represented by a Vakil in the Court of first instance and contested the suit. No application for amendment of the plaint was however filed by the plaintiff, nor was any amendment ordered by the Court. The name of Ram Dial the second therefore continued in the plaint as a minor under the guardianship of his mother. When the plaintiffs appealed to the lower appellate Court they impleaded Ram Dial the second as major and he was again represented by a Vakil. The lower appellate Court found in favour of the plaintiffs that it had not been established that they had any knowledge of the sale or that they had refused to purchase the property. It also found that the real sale consideration was Rs. 1000/-. Both the suits were however dismissed on the technical ground that Ram Dial had been treated in the Court of first instance as a minor whereas in fact he was of age.

We are of opinion that the decrees of the lower appellate Court cannot stand. It is true that no amendment of the plaint was made and the name of Ram Dial continued to be entered as a minor. All the same he had full knowledge of the proceedings in Court. He actually appeared in Court and was represented by his Vakil as major and was also represented as such before the lower appellate Court. Assuming that there was any irregularity it was fully cured by the conduct of both the parties. We therefore think that this ground was not sufficient ground whatsoever for dismissing the suits altogether. The case of Ramachari v. Duraisami Pillai (1) and that of Gonga Ram v. Mihin Lal (2) are authorities in fovour of the view we have taken.

It is found by the lower appellate Court that all the three pre-emptors had equal rights and none had a preferential right. They therefore are entitled each to a 1/3rd share in the pre-empted property.

We accordingly allow these appeals set aside the decrees of the lower appellate Court and decree the plaintiff's suits as directed below. In view of the circumstances however each party should bear its own costs. The decree shall be prepared in accordance with order 20 rule 14.

The claim of each of the two plaintiffs is therefore decreed for 1/3rd share of the property on payment of 1/3rd of the sale consideration as found above within 60 days from this date. In case of non-payment it would be open to the plaintiff in the connected suit to deposit that amount within an additional period of 30 days and claim that 1/3rd share also. On failure of payment by either of the two plaintiffs the appeals will stand dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

S. A. No. 46 of 1922, Decided on 25th April 1923 against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Basti, D/- the 30th August 1921.

Civil P. C., O. 22 R. 4—Joint decree against respondents—Failure to bring on record representative of a deceased respondent—whole appeal fails.

Where a joint decree has been given in favour of the respondents, the entire appeal fails if the appellant fails to bring the legal representatives of a deceased respondent on record (30 C.L.J. 217; 67 P.R. 1919; 1922 Patna 606 Foll.) [P. 96 C. 1.]

K. Varma—for Appellants.

N. C. Vaish—for Respondents.

Judgment.—In this case a preliminary objection is taken to the hearing of the appeal on the ground that it has abated. The facts are that two of the respondents Bhagwat Pande and Chhotkan Pande are dead and that no steps have been taken to bring their legal representatives on the record. As they admittedly died prior to 1st June last there is no doubt that the appeal has abated against them. The respondent contends however that under the circumstances of the case the appeal abated against all the respondents. Chhotkan Pande was plaintiff No. 13 in the original array of parties and was No. 19 in the list of respondents in this Court. Bhagwat Pande son of Harihar Pande is No. 7 in the list of plaintiffs respondents attached to the memorandum of appeal. As a matter of fact no such name appears either in the plaint or in the memorandum of appeal to the lower appellate Court and a comparison of the names in the plaint with those in the memorandum of appeal to this Court goes to show that this name has been written by mistake for that of Hanwant Pande son of Sheombar Pande. The name of the latter does not appear anywhere in the array of parties to the appeal.

The decree declaring them to be owners in possession of the plots in suit has been given to the plaintiffs jointly against the defendants jointly. The plaintiffs are zemindars of one village Bitni Khurd and the defendants zemindars of another village Dippur and the dispute was in which of these two villages the lands in suit fall. The appellant relies on the language of clause (3) of rule 4 of Order 22, C. P. C. That rule says that where no application to bring the legal representatives on the record is made within limitation the suit shall abate as against the deceased defendant. By Rule 11 of the same order the word defendant includes a respondent. There is however authority for the view that notwithstanding the wording of this rule where joint decree has been given in favour of the respondents the entire appeal fails if the appellant fails to make some of the respondents a party. This has been followed by the Patna High Court in Tej Narain Sahu v. Dal Ram (1) This was held in Baser Seikh v. Fazle Karim (2) where the defendants were appealing against a decree for joint possession and failed to serve notices of appeal on two of the plaintiffs-respondents. It was also held in Manmohan Pande v. Bidhu (3) a case in which the legal representatives of one of the co-proprietors of a firm were not brought on the record. Jamna v. Sarjit (4). [This case has been followed in the later case of Sardari Lal v. Ram Lal (5)] is another case exactly on all fours with the present in which the proprietors of a village had obtained a joint declaratory decree declaring their interest in the land in dispute. The same view was taken in another case of a declaratory decree, Kali Dayal v. Nagendra Nath (6) in which the whole case law on the subject is reviewed. The ground of decision was that although Order 22 Rule 4 only provides for the appeal abating as against the deceased respondent the result of its abating against him may be in certain cases that the appeal has thereafter become imperfectly constituted, so that the appellant can no longer invite the Court to adjudicate upon the matters in controversy. The representatives of the deceased decree holders, against whom the appeal has abated, have obtained an unassailable decree declaring that they jointly with the other decree-holders are proprietors in possession of the suit land. If the appeal were allowed as against the other decree-holders the result would be two contrary declarations; one declaring that the proprietors of the respondent's village are entitled to and in possession of the land in question and the other declaring that they are not so entitled and in possession. It has been held in these cases that this is a state of things which the law does not contemplate and which cannot be allowed. That it would result in very serious inconveniences in practice is self-evident.

It has been suggested on behalf of the appellants that I should adjourn the case to give the appellants an opportunity of ascertaining and stating by affidavit whether there are any heirs of Chhutkan Pande. This is not a request which can be accepted. In the first place, it was for the appellants to bring the legal representatives on the record and they have not done so. In the second place, there must be some legal representatives even if he, in the last resort the Crown. This is not a case of an undivided Hindu joint family in which the right passes by survivorship. It is a case of an undivided zemindari village in which the proprietors are tenants-in-common. For the reasons already given I hold that the entire appeal has abated and I accordingly dismiss it with costs in favour of the answering respondents

Appeal dismissed.

(b) Easements Act S. 15 .Ex. 2—Enjoyment can be without user.

The enjoyment necessary to qualify for a right of easement, is something very different from a tual user. In order to establish a right to an easement, the enjoyment of it must continue for twenty years ; but in the case of discontinuous easements, this does not mean that the actual user is to continue for the whole period of twenty years. On the contrary, there may be days and weeks and months, during which the right may not be exercised at all, and yet during all those days and weeks and months, the person claiming the right may have been in full enjoyment of it when necessary. 30 Cal. 1077 Foll. [P 98, C 1]

Hamid Hasan—for Appellants.

S. D. Sinha—for Respondents.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—The question for consideration in this appeal is whether the plaintiffs have acquired by prescription a right to irrigate from the wells in dispute. Their allegation was that the wells in question had been constructed by the defendants jointly with them but they failed to prove that they had contributed to the expenses of the construction of those wells The Courts below found that they have been irrigating certain fields from those wells partly from 1304 and partly from 1307 fasli, that is, for a period of twenty years prior to the suit, whenever irrigation was needed, and that they had acquired a prescriptive right to irrigate those fields from those wells. It is urged on behalf of the defendants appellants, that the plaintiffs ought not to have been granted any relief on a ground not set up in the plaint and that the evidence adduced was insufficient to establish that there was a continued enjoyment for twenty years prior to the suit. In the plaint, the allegation put down by the plaintiffs undoubtedly was that they were the joint owners of the wells in question, but they had also mentioned that they had all along irrigated the plots owned and possessed by them from the wells in dispute since the time of their construction without any obstruction or interference on the part of any of the defendants. They referred in support of their statement to the entries in the revenue records wherein the said enjoyment of the right of irrigation is said to have been noted. They further averred that they had legally acquired a right of irrigation from the wells aforesaid. Their suit was thus based practically on two different grounds, of which only the latter found favour with the Courts below. As observed in Narendra Nath Barari v. Abhoy Charan Chattopadhya (1) a suit is not liable to be dismissed because the plaintiff claims in the alternative over the same plot of land both rights of ownership and of easement.

As regards the period during which the right of irrigation has been enjoyed a statement was prepared by the trial Court showing that certain plots enjoyed the benefits of irrigation from 1304 and 1307 fasli. The revenue records for all the subsequent years were not filed. But from the entries made in such records of which copies were filed, the Courts below came to the conclusion that the right of irrigation was enjoyed without any interruption or obstruction for requisite period. The lower appellate Court observed that it was not shown that if there were any temporary cessation, it was due to any action on the part of the defendants, and that it may well be that omission to take water may have been due to the fact that there may have been no need for it. Explanation II of S. 15 of the Indian Easements Act of 1882. lays down that nothing is an interruption within the meaning of that section unless there is an actual cessation of the enjoyment by reason of an obstruction by the act of some person other than the claimant. As held in Koylash Chunder Ghose v. Sonotun Chung (2) the enjoyment necessary to qualify for a right of easement, is something very different from actual user. In order to establish a right to an easement, the enjoyment of it must continue for twenty years; but in the case of discontinuous easements, this does not mean that the actual user is to continue for the whole period of twenty years. On the contrary, there may be days and weeks and months, during which the right may not be exercised at all, and yet during all those days and weeks and months, the person claiming the right may have been in full enjoyment of it, when necessary. In Budhu Mandal v. Maliat Mandal (3) it was similarly held that an easement may be established in respect of a right to cause river water to flow across the servient tenement on to the dominant tenement for the purpose of irrigation by means of embankments erected on the dominant tenement. It is immeterial whether the excercise of the right was continuous, provided it was excercised for the statutory period, during seasons of draught, when it could be taken advantage of. In Ghasiram Mandal v. Asirbad Mahto (4) it was similarly held that if the water of a tank was always used for irrigating the defendant's lands and there was a user by the defendant whenever it was necessary, for a period of more than twenty years, the right to irrigate from the tank would be deemed to have been substantially enjoyed for the requisite period.

The decision in Hollins v. Verney (5) is not applicable, because there the question related to a right of way and there was evidence to show that between certain intervals the way was occasionally stopped up.

The defendants have failed to show that there has been an actual interruption in the exercise of the right of irrigation or that the plots in dispute were during certain years irrigated from other sources. There may have been no irrigation because of excessive rainfall or because of the land in question having been allowed to be fallow in certain years. In any case, in the absence of any proof of interruption, the plaintiffs are entitled to a prescriptive right to irrigate their land from the wells in question, as they have been doing since 1304 and 1307 Fasli. The appeal therefore fails and is dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The facts out of which this appeal arises are as follows:—

Ibrahim Ali Khan owned property some of which is in suit. He died leaving 3 sons and 3 daughters, one of whom was Musammat Batul-unnissa who was entitled to 1/9th of the property owned by Ibrahim Ali Khan at his death. She died leaving a son Anwar-ul-Hasan, who became entitled to 2/3rds of the 1/9th share inherited by his mother. He sold his share to Muhib Ali, who sold to Mazhar Husain, who in turn sold to the plaintiff. This is a suit by the plaintiff for declaration and for possession of the property. The defendant No. 1 is Anwar-ul-Hasan, the transferor of the property. Defendants 2 to 9 are the persons who represent the sons and daughters of Ibrahim Ali Khan. Defendants 10 to 25 are subsequent transferees from the sons of these defendants. Nos. 22 to 25 are wards under the Court of Wards Defendants 22 to 25 alone contested the suit, on the ground that the notice required by S. 54 of the Court of Wards Act (Act No. IV of 1912 of the local legislature) had not been duly served. This plea was upheld in both Courts and an ex parte decree was passed against defendants 1 to 21 and the suit was dismissed as against defendants 22 to 25. The plaintiff brings this appeal on two grounds. Firstly, it is argued that, inasmuch as Mazhar Husain, who sold the property to the plaintiff had given notice of his intention to bring a suit similar to this one against the Court of Wards, that notice enured for the benefit of the plaintiff.

Secondly, that in any case S. 54 of the U. P. Court of Wards Act was not applicable, because the suit did not relate to "the property" of the wards.

With regard to the first plea it is only necessary to say that the ruling in Bachhu Singh v. Secy. of State (1) is conclusive.

On the second plea it seems to us that, on the allegation in the plaint itself in paragraph 12, the plaintiff admits that the wards have an interest in the property. The ruling on which he relies, namely, Lal Singh v. Collector of Etah (2) has no application. There the property did not belong to the ward but to the judgment-debtor of the ward, and the mere fact that the ward had attached that property did not create any right in the property in the ward. The very fact that the plaintiff has appealed from the decree of the first Court dismissing the suit against the wards shows clearly that the plaintiff himself realized that the suit does relate to the property of the wards. In our opinion the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Ryves, J.—Gulab Singh was the mortgagor, and Gopi Ram was the mortgagee, who is now represented by the plaintiff. Mahabir Prasad was joined as a defendant in the suit by the plaintiff for sale on the mortgage executed by Gulab Singh, as a subsequent purchaser of part of the mortgaged property. He set up among other defences that he had a prior mortgage on the property. The plaintiff's suit was decreed subject to his paying off the prior mortgage set up by Mahabir Prasad. A preliminary decree was passed on the 14th of March 1916. From that decree the plaintiff appealed against so much of the decree as directed him to pay off the prior mortgage set up by Mahabir Prasad. That appeal was decreed by the District Judge on the 2nd of June 1916. From that decree Mahabir Prasad appealed to the High Court and his appeal was dismissed on the 1st of August 1918. Then the plaintiff applied for a final decree on the 14th of April 1920. Both Courts have allowed the application. The defendant Mahabir Prasad, who is now represented by the appellant in this appeal, contended that the application was barred by limitation. Both Courts below have held that limitation began to run from the date of the High Court's decree, namely, the 1st of August 1918, and that therefore it was well within limitation. In appeal before us it is argued that inasmuch as in the appeal by the plaintiff before the District Judge against the prior mortgage set up by Mahabir Prasad some of the defendants were not made parties, that decree must be taken to be the starting point of limitation. It seems to us that inasmuch as Mahabir Prasad himself appealed to this High Court he cannot be heard to advance that plea. Reliance has been placed on a case reported as Gyan Singh v. Ata Husain (1) but there the objection was upheld in favour of the parties who had not appealed. It seems to us that this case is covered by the authority of Nizam-ud-din Shah v. Bohra Bhim Sen, (2) which followed the Full Bench ruling in Gajadhar Singh v. Kishan Jiwan Lal (3). In our opinion the appeal must be dismissed with costs including in this Court, fees on the higher scale.

Judgment.—The facts of this case need not be detailed at length. They are rather long and would only encumber this judgment. The suit was for recovery of possession of the site of a certain house on the ground of auction purchase. The Munsif framed six issues and having dealt with them in sufficient detail gave a decree in the plaintiff's favour. The chief defendant Gupta Nand went up in appeal and contested almost all the findings of the first Court. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has disposed of the appeal which raised so many questions by the following judgment. "The learned Munsif has dealt with the matter exhaustively, and I can see no reason to differ from any of his conclusions. The appeal is dismissed with costs." The defendant comes here in second appeal and the first contention raised by his learned Vakil is that the lower appellate Court has not disposed of the case as it has written no judgment as is required by law. Reliance is placed on order 41 rule 31 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This ground of appeal must prevail. The provisions of the law are mandatory and the reason is obvious. A Judge is bound to give the points for decision and the reasons for the decision thereon in order to enable the Court of appeal to see that the Judge whose findings on facts are binding on this Court has put properly before him the points at issue and has decided them. This view has been consistently taken by this Court for more than a quarter of a century. Mr. Justice Straight, then Officiating Chief Justice, observed in the case of Sohawan v. Babu Nand (1). "I am of opinion that the so-called judgment of the lower appellate Court to which exception is taken was, in law, no judgment at all, because it does not satisfy the requirements of S. 574 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in not stating the points for determination raised by the pleas in appeal, the decision upon them, and the reasons for that decision." In the same case Mr Justice Mahmood observed at page 31 as follows. "I cannot but hold that S. 574 of the Code contains one of the most salutary provisions of the law, and that considering that this Court in second appeal is bound to accept the findings of fact arrived at by the lower appellate Courts, we must insist upon a due obedience by those Courts of the mandate of the legislature contained in that section.'. The judgment pronounced in the present case might be typed and stitched to any case from a simple money suit to a suit for determination of most complicated questions of the law of mortgage. The latest case of this Court which I have been able to find in this connection is the case of Babban Singh v. Jaimangal Singh (2).

Having regard to the authorities cited above I have come to the conclusion that there has been no proper determination of the appeal by the lower appellate Court. I therefore allow the appeal set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and remand the case to that Court under order 41 rule 23 to decide the points raised therein and to write a judgment according to law. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

U. P. Excise Act (1910), S. 64 (c)—Sale in presence of one partner—Liability of the other partner—Master and servant—Partner and partner—No difference.

Two excise licensees J. and T. who were partners in a country liquor shop license had been convicted under S. 64 (c) of the U. P. Excise Act 1910 of committing a breach of the conditions of the license by selling liquor out of the prescribed hours and also by selling adulterated liquor. T. was present at the shop when these offences were detected. J. the other licensee was not present and there was no suggestion that he knew anything about the irregular sales.

Held: that J's. conviction was right, he being equally guilty as T. (24 B. 423 and 9 A L.J. 288 Ref..) The real test so far as agency is concerned is not the nature of the act but the nature of the business. The nature of the act is the test which decides the criminality. The law of partnership is merely a breach of the law of agency just like the law of master and servant, and for this purpose two partners stand to one another in the same relation as master and servant. [P. 101, C. 2]

The parties were not represented.

The following is the referring order passed by the District Magistrate of Agra:—

Two excise licensees who are partners in a country liquor shop license have been convicted under S. 64 (c) of the U. P. Excise Act, 1910 of committing a breach of the conditions of the license by selling liquor out of the prescribed hours and also by selling adulterated liquor, One of the partners Tika Ram was present at the shop when these offences were detected. It is admitted that Jwala Prasad the other licensee was not present and there is no suggestion that he knew anything about the irregular sales. The Deputy Magistrate has convicted Jwala Prasad on the strength of the ruling of the Hon'ble High Court, Babu Lal v. King Emperor (1). It has been argued before me that that ruling establishes only the liability of a master for the act of his servant, and that it does not follow that one partner is liable for the acts of the other partner. I do not accept this contention. It seems to me that one partner must be held to be liable for the acts of the other partner The second point however, urged before me in revision appears to be valid. The important point in the ruling quoted which followed the case of Queen Empress v. Tayab Ali (2) was that in order to establish the offence under the section of the Opium Act it was not necessary to prove intention, mens rea or knowledge, and that the mere act constituted the offence. In the present case S. 64 (c) of the U. P. Excise Act makes it an offence if any one being the holder of a license wilfully does or omits to do anything in breach of any of the conditions of the license. The use of the word "wilfully" appears to me to make it clear that in order to establish this offence it is necessary to prove intention or knowledge, and on the facts found by the Deputy Magistrate there is no such proof against Jwala Prasad. I therefore forward the record for the order of the Hon'ble High Court with the recommendation that the conviction of Jwala Prasad be set aside.

Walsh, J.—I do not agree with the District Magistrate. mens rea has nothing to do with it. It is quite true that the section requires a wilful breach of the condition. A man may accidently commit a breach. For example if a man's watch was five minutes slow and he sold liquor two minutes to eight by his own time and it turned out to be two minutes past eight by the right time, that would not be a wilful breach. But a sale is a sale, and I have not the slightest doubt that the servant intended to sell the liquor and to take the money for it, and if he pocketed the money and refused to hand it over to his master and said that it was an accidental sale and not a wilful sale and therefore the money did not belong to the master but to the servant, the master would have been very angry. The real test so for as agency is concerned is not the nature of the act but the nature of the business. The nature of the act is the test which decides the criminality. If the sale is wilful or the breach of the licence is wilful, then the servant has committed an offence. But the question still remains whether his master is liable, and in all these quasi-Civil transactions which are really questions of contract, the view has always been held that the legislature intended th t the maxim making the superior answerable should apply to sales which are carried through in breach of the conditions of the licence by a man whom the master has put in the shop for the purpose of selling on his behalf and for his profit and therefore if the man who actually took the money and transferred the liquor to the purchaser had been a servant, Jwala would have been answerable as his master. The law of partnership is merely a breach of the law of agency just like the law of master and servant, and for this purpose two partners stand to one another in the same relation as master and servant.

This was a wilful breach of the license. It was committed by Tika Ram as agent for Jwala the other partner, and in my opinion that makes Jwala equally liable and the Magistrate was right. I see no reason to interfere and I direct the record to be returned to the District Magistrate. I may add that I agree with both the cases which have been cited, namely Queen Empress v. Tayab Ali (2) and Babu Lal v. King Emperor (1). It is hard on Jwala if he was on bad terms with Tika Ram and objected to this class of illicit dealing, but if he can prove that, he can press for the recovery of his fine from Tika Ram I think in the taking of the partnership accounts. Let the record be returned.

Agra Tenancy Act, S. 167—Scope.

Where the suit was for a declaration under S. 95 (a) and the real object of this suit was to have a declaration against both the Zemindar and the son o' the tenant who was recorded as such that the plaintiffs were the occupancy tenants of the holding.

Held: Such a suit can only be brought in a Court of Revenue. [P. 103, C. 1]

Judgment.—Shamsi was the occupancy tenant of the land in dispute. He died leaving four sons Sher Khan, Zainuddin, Baz Khan and Khairuddin. The plaintiffs are Khairuddin and the four sons of Zainuddin who is dead and the three sons of Baz Khan who is also dead. These plaintiffs brought this suit in the Revenue Court at Moradabad against Sher Khan and the Zamindar. The suit purported to be one under S 95 (a) of the Agra Tenancy Act. In their plaint after reciting the above facts they stated that on the death of Shamsi his four sons jointly cultivated the land but the name of Sher Khan alone was entered in the revenue papers because he was the eldest son and was the head of the family. The plaintiffs assert that they are in possession of the land as heirs of Shamsi but that inasmuch as the zemindar does not admit that they are tenants the suit was brought for a declaration under S. 95 (a) of the Agra Tenancy Act. The Assistant Collector before whom the case came held that the suit was triable by a Civil Court and dismissed it On appeal the learned Additional District Judge of Moradabad has upheld this view. The plaintiffs come here in second appeal and the only point taken is that the suit was one exclusively triable by the Revenue Court, and my attention has been drawn to the cases of Ram Charan Rai v. Jinsi Ahiram (1). Baljit v. Mahipal (2) and Jagannath v. Balwant Singh (3). It seems to me from a perusal of the plaint itself that the real object of this suit was to have a declaration against both the zemindar and Sher Khan that the plaintiffs were the occupancy tenants of the holding. Such a suit it seems to me can only be brought in a Court of revenue, having regard to the S. 167 of the Agra Tenancy Act. I therefore allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and direct that the plaint be returned through the learned District Judge to the trial Court to restore to its original number and to dispose of it according to law. Costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale will abide the result.

Judgment.—The dispute in this appeal relates to plot No. 584/2 Khasra measuring 3 biswas 18 dhurs and situated in the village Mahnlia. The plaintiffs claim to be the owners of that plot and complain that the defendants had without any right constructed certain cattle troughs and fixed certain pegs for tying cattle over a portion of the said land in the month of Bhalon preceding the suit. The defendants on the other hand assert that the cattle troughs and pegs in question stand on their own land and have been in existence for more than 12 years prior to the suit. The Courts below found that the land in question belonged to the plaintiffs but the cattle troughs had been in existence for more than 12 years prior to the suit They dismissed the suit of the plaintiffs as barred by time.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiffs appellants relies on the decision in Framji Cursetji v. Gocu'das Madhowji (1) and contends that such temporary user, even if it is of a long standing, can give the defendants no right to continue to occupy the and; but the user here is not of a emporary character. A place for the tying of cattle is one of the necessary adjuncts of an agriculturist's occupation and residence in the village. The cattle troughs in question are situated close to the house of the defendants and as the defendant's have been allowed to use the land and to maintain the cattle troughs for more than 12 years without obstruction, the plaintiffs are not entitled to have those troughs removed. The troughs do not however occupy the whole land and no question of adverse possession can therefore arise.

The appeal is dismissed except in so far that the proprietary title of the plaintiffs to the land in dispute will remain unaffected. The parties will under the circumstances bear their own costs of this Court.

Appeal allowed in part.

Civil P. C., O. 34 Rr. 2, 4, 10—Personal liability to pay costs does not exist before final decree.

Where no final decree has been passed, it is not open to the mortgagee decree-holder to apply for recovery of costs from the person of the judgment-debtor. 40 A. 109 and 48 I. C. 329, Ref. 17 A. L. J. 582, Dist.

K. N. Katju and M. N. Raina—for Appellant.

P. L. Banerjee—for Respondent.

Kanhaiya, Lal, J:—This appeal arises out of an application made by the decree-holder respondent for the recovery of certain costs awarded to him by an appellate decree of this Court from the person of the judgment-debtors. It appears that the decree-holder obtained a preliminary decree for the sale of certain property against the present judgment-debtor and other persons which provided that in the case of non-payment of the decretal money, including the costs awarded by the trial Court, the mortgaged property was to be sold. From that decree some of the heirs of the original mortgagor appealed to this Court. Their appeal was unsuccessful, and was dismissed excepting so far that the time for the payment of the money was extended; and the decree-holder respondent was awarded his costs as against them. The effect of the dismissal of the appeal with the modification mentioned above was that the decree of the trial Court as amended, merged into the decree of this Court, and until it was made final it could not be executed against the mortgaged property. The decree-holder sought in the present proceedings to recover the costs awarded to him by the decree of the appellate Court, but Order 34 rule 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in finally adjusting the amount to be paid to a mortgagee in case of a foreclosure or sale or redemption, the Court shall, unless the conduct of the mortgagee has been such as to disentitle him to costs, add to the mortgage money such costs of the suit as have been properly incurred by him since the decree for foreclosure or sale or redemption up to the time of actual payment. It is open to a Court of appeal to direct that such costs as it may award against the unsuccessful appellant may be recoverable from him personally, but if there is not such express direction the costs are as a matter of ordinary practice sanctioned by Order 34 rules 2,4 and 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be added to the mortgage money and are in the first instance recoverable from the mortgaged property after the decree is made final. That view has been recognised in the case of Dambar Singh v. Kalyan Singh (1) and Mirza Saddiq Husain Khan v Mt Ummatul Fatima (2) the Court below has relied on the decision in the case of Amina Bibi v. Rama

(1) [1918] 40 All. 109—15 A. L. J. 914—43 I. C. 557.
(2) [1918] 48 I. C. 329.

Shundar Misra (3) but in that case the decree sought to be executed was a final decree in a mortgage suit, which provided for the extension of the time for payment by the mortgagor for another six months from the date thereof and went on to direct the appellant to pay the respondents a certain sum of money. A final decree stands however on a different footing from a preliminary decree for sale. A preliminary decree is supposed to direct the taking of accounts of what would be due on the mortgage including the costs of the suit in the manner provided by Order 34 rules 2,4 and 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure A final decree is intended to give the result of the account, as it would stand on the date of that decree, showing the money due on the mortgage including the costs recoverable from the mort gaged property, and if that final decree cantains a separate direction for the payment of costs by a certain party to another, the situation becomes entirely different. In that particular case the costs in question were the costs of an unsuccessful appeal brought in the High Court by one only of several mortgagors against the final decree. In the present case no final decree has yet been prepared. The preliminary decree merely directed the taking of accounts and the payment of a certain sum of money including costs within a certain period, with a proviso that if the said amount was not so paid, the mortgaged property shall be liable to be sold. That decree merged in the appellate decree of this Court. The latter is the only decree capable of being made final; and the two decrees must be read together in order to determine the rights of the parties and the remedies at present available to them. We do not at any moment suggest that the right of the decree-holder to recover the costs from the person of the then unsuccessful appellants is altogether excluded. The remedy of the decree-holder at the present stage is to get a final decree prepared, showing the money due on the mortgage inclusive of the costs of the suit and the costs incurred subsequent to the preliminary decree for sale and when such a decree has been obtained he can execute the decree against the mortgaged property and then pursue such remedy as may be available to him, after the mortgaged property has been sold for the recovery of the rest of the money due to him on account of the decree. In that view of the matter this appeal must be allowed and the order of the Court below set aside. the result being that the application of the decree-holder will stand dismissed with costs here and hitherto including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Civil P. C., S. 145—Enforcement of security is not limited to personal liability.

The object of this section is to provide that where a person has become liable as a surety for the performance of a decree or order under the section for a party for whose benefit a security has been given may enforce the security by executing the decree or order against the surety in the same manner as if the surety had been a party to the decree or order and was directed by the decree or order to perform the obligation undertaken by him. In the clause "to the extent to which he has rendered himself liable" the word "personally" was added by the present Code of Civil Procedure, but by the addition of that it could hardly have been intended to limit the enforcement of the security to a personal liability, for forms 2, 3 and 4 of the appendix G appended to the Code of Civil Procedure provide for the hypothecation of property to secure the performance of the obligation undertaken by the surety The personal or individual liability of the surety under the security bond may not, always, be as extensive as that of the judgment debtor, and the object of the above provision clearly is to limit the enforcement to the extent provided for by the security bond.

Where the security bond did not purport to have been executed in favour of the decree holder and contained an undertaking given to an appellate Court which granted the stay of execution subject to the production of such security.

Kumuda Prasad and Gajadhar Prasad—for Respondents.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—This is an appeal from an order refusing to enforce a security bond, filed under Order 41 rule 5, C. P. C., by an execution proceeding. In the course of an appeal pending in this Court an order for the stay of execution of a decree for costs was obtained by the judgment debtor pending the decision of that appeal and a security bond executed by him and his surety Chaudhri Badan Singh was filed whereby the latter agreed to stand surity for Rs. 15,000 and hypothecated certain property for the payment of the same in case the money which may be found due under the decree was not realised from the judgment debtor. The security bond stated. "We the executants willingly give security for Rs 15,000 and after hypothecating the property specified below agree that if the appellate Court affirms the decree of the Court of first instance, then I, Rao Narsingh Rao, will duly carry out the decree of the appellate Court and whatever costs may be allowed under the said decree on account of the costs of the trial Court and of the appellate Court shall be paid by me (Rao Narsingh Rao) with interest irrespective of the above mentioned security for Rs. 15,000. If Rao Narsingh Rao does not do so, then the sum which may be due under the decree may be realised from the hypothecated property of the executants."

The Court below has found that no personal liability was undertaken by the surety under the above deed and that the only remedy of the decree-holder was to enforce the mortgage security by a separate suit for sale. S. 145 C. P. C. provides that where any person has become liable as a surety for the performance of any decree or any part thereof or for the restitution of any property taken in execution of a decree or for the payment of any money or for the fulfilment of any condition imposed in any suit or proceeding, the decree or order may be executed against him to the extent to which he has rendered himself personally liable in the manner provided for the execution of decrees, and such person shall, for the purposes of the appeal, be deemed a party within the meaning of S. 47. The object of this section is to provide that where a person has become liable as a surety for the performance of a decree or for any of the purposes above specified, the party for whose benefit the security has been given may enforce the security by executing the decree or order against the surety in the same manner as if the surety had been a party to the decree or order and was directed by the decree or order to perform the obligation undertaken by him. S. 253 of the old Code of Civil Procedure was limited to cases where a security bond was filed for the performance of a decree and authorised the enforcement thereof against the surety to the extent to which he had rendered himself liable in the same manner as a decree could be executed against the defendant. In the clause "to the extent to which he has rendered himself liable" the word "personally" was added by the present Code of Civil Procedure, but by the addition of that word it could hardly have been intended to limit the enforcement of the security to a personal liability, for forms 2, 3 and 4 of appendix G appended to the Code of Civil Procedure provide for the hypothecation of property to secure the performance of the obligation undertaken by the surety. The personal or individual liability of the surety under the security bond may not, always, be as extensive as that of the judgment debtor, and the object of the above provision clearly is to limit the enforcement to the extent provided for by the security bond. Beyond a statement that the surety willingly gave security Rs. 15,000, there was nothing in the terms of the present bond to indicate that he undertook a personal liability. On the other hand there was a clear indication that the money which may be found due on the decree passed in appeal would be realizable in the first instance from the judgment debtor, and that if the judgment debtor did not pay the same, it would be recoverable from the property hypothecated by the surety. There was no personal covenent by the surety to pay the same in case the hypothecated property was found to be insufficient. The only question for consideration in these circumstances is whether S. 145 C. P. C. is applicable and whether the security bond can be enforced by an application for the execution of the decree. The security bond does not purport to have been executed in favour of the decree holder. It contains an undertaking given to an appellate Court which granted the stay of execution subject to the production of such security, and as held in the case of Janki Kuer v. Sarup Rani (1) such a bond can be enforced by the Court below in the same way as a decree. In the case of Mukta Prasad v. Mahadeo Prasad (2 a similar view was taken. In the case of Raj Raghubar Singh v. Jai Indra Bahadur Singh (3) their Lordships of the Privy Council allowed the security bond to be enforced in somewhat similar circumstances against the hypothecated property without a separate suit for sale.

The Court below refers to the decision in the case of Amir v. Mahadeo Prasad, (4) but in that case the equity of redemption in the hypothecated property had passed from the surety to a third person who could not be treated for the purposes of S. 145 C. P. C. as a party to the decree and against whom the security could not have been enforced except by a separate suit for sale. In the case of Shyam Sundar Lal v. Bajpai Jainarayan (5) and in the case of Subramanian Chettiar v. Rajarajeswar Sethupathi, (6) security bonds hypothecating immoveable property as security for the due performance of a decree have been allowed to be enforced by execution without a separate suit being considered necessary. Where the equity of redemption is still held by the surety, the surety is the primary person from whom the amount of security can be recovered, and S. 145 C. P. C. is intended to enable the enforcement of such security. The appeal is therefore allowed with costs in this Court on the higher scale and the order of the Court below set aside and the case is remanded to that Court with a direction to reinstate it under its original number and to proceed with the disposal of the matter in accordance with law.

P. L. Banerjee—for Respondent.

Daniels, J:—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff Thakur Laiq Singh for sale of the mortgaged property on the basis of his mortgage. The mortgage was executed by Sumer Singh the original owner of the property as far back as the 1st June 1904. Sumer Singh subsequently sold his equity of redemption. The defendant appellant Parshadi Lal brought a pre-emption suit on the basis of this sale and was successful. He is therefore the owner of the property subject to the plaintiff's mortgage. He himself subsequently on 22nd October 1908. executed a mortgage in favour of one Ram Prasad who is not before the Court. The sole question for decision in this appeal is whether the whole suit should have been dismissed on account of the plaintiff's failure to implead Ram Prasad.

Both Courts have relied on this ruling in Alam Singh v. Gokul Singh (1). That was a case in which the plaintiff mortgagee omitted to implead a subsequent mortgagee who held a mortgage of part only of the mortgaged property. The Court held that it was not necessary to dismiss the entire suit but gave a decree against that portion of the property which was not covered by the subsequent mortgage.The trial Court considered that it necessarily followed from this ruling that if the subsequent mortgage covered the entire property the entire suit must be dismissed. In the appellate Court the plaintiff relied on the principle that Order 34 rule 1, which directs that all persons having an interest in the mortgaged property must be joined as parties, is subject to Order 1 rule 9 which says that no suit shall be dismissed merely on the ground of non-joinder of parties. If therefore relief could be given to the plaintiff without prejudicing the right of Ram Prasad who had not joined. Order 34 rule 1 did not necessarily stand in the way of such relief being granted. The learned Judge considered that if this object could be effected in one way it could also be effected in another according to the circumstances of the particular case. In the case cited it was effected by passing a decree for sale of part of the mortgage only. In the present case, in order that the rights of Ram Prasad should not be prejudiced, the plaintiff offered to give up his priority and to accept a decree subject to the mortgage in favour of Ram Prasad which should be treated as having preference over his own. The learned Judge of the Court below has passed a decree in these terms.

The decree under appeal does full justice as between the parties to the suit. The appellant is in no way prejudiced by it. He was bound to pay the plaintiff's mortgage. He was bound also to pay the mortgage in favour of Ram Prasad. So far as he is concerned the respective priority as between these two mortgagees is a matter of comparative indifference. He has in fact tried to take advantage of the technical ground of nonjoinder of Ram Prasad in order to escape liability for paying the plaintiff's mortgage altogether. Unless the provisions of law very clearly require it this contention ought not, on ground of justice and equity, to be accepted.

In my opinion the reasoning of the Court below is sound. The object of Order 34 rule 1 is to prevent multiplicity of suits and to secure that no injury is done to the rights of any party through his not being impleaded. The provision is expressly made subject to other provisions of the Code which include Order 1 rule 9, and it has been laid down many times that where it is possible for the Court to do justice as between the parties before it, it should do so and should not make order 34 rule 1 a ground for dismissing the entire suit. The Bombay High Court recently in the case of Shivubai Rajaram v. Shiddheswar (2) refused to allow a redemption suit to be dismissed altogether because certain heirs of the original mortgagees had not been joined. But the case which is most directly parallel to that before me is that of Sital Prasad v. Asho Singh (3). The facts of that case were exactly on all fours. The plaintiff was suing on his mortgage and had failed to implead a subsequent mortgagee. The contention was, as here, that the entire suit should be dismissed in consequence. The Court went further than it is necessary to do in this case and held that a decree could be passed in favour of the plaintiff without making any condition as to the absent defendants, on the ground that the decree could not in any case be allowed to operate to the prejudice of the subsequent mortgagee who was no party to it. In the present case the decree passed by the Court below does substantial justice between the parties and in my opinion the provisions of Order 34 rule 1 which must be read subject to those of Order 1 rule 9 do not have the effect of rendering it illegal. I accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Daniels, J.–Jhari Koeri the plaintiff appellant in this case is the auction purchaser of a fixed-rate holding. The holding originally belonged to one Babu Lal and was inherited by his wife Mt. Chaurasi. Mt. Chaurasi was in possession of another holding, either a fixed rate or occupancy holding, probably the latter, which she had also inherited from her husband. A decree for arrears of rent against this latter holding was obtained against her. Instead of taking ejectment proceedings under S. 57 (a) and 61 of the Tenancy Act the land holder put to sale the fixed-rate holding now in dispute, which was already mortgaged to him, and it was purchased by the plaintiff under two sale certificates dated the 21st June 1909 and 24th November 1910. The plaintiff obtained possession of the holding. Mt. Chaurasi died about two years before the suit and on her death the defendants, who are remote reversioners of Babu Lal, managed to get possession of the holding, thereby ousting the plaintiff. The defendants set up title to the holding on the strength of having obtained a relinquishment from a son of one of the daughters of Babu Lal. As it appears that there were daughters of Babu Lal in existence who were nearer heirs, the defendants' title is not assisted by this relinquishment, and both Courts have found that they have no title. The Courts have differed as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover possession from them. The main point in dispute was whether the plaintiff purchased merely the life interest of Mt. Chaurasi. The trial Court held that in either case the plaintiff's title was good against all the world except the immediate reversionary heirs, and the defendants having no title the plaintiff was entitled to get back possession. The lower appellate Court considered that as the decree for arrears of rent was passed against Mt. Chaurasi the plaintiff's purchase could only be of her life interest. It further held that as the defendants were in possession it did not matter whether they had a good title or not unless the plaintiff could prove that he purchased the entire interest in the holding. Being of opinion that the plaintiff's purchase was of Mt. Chaurasi's life interest only the learned judge allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

The question therefore for decision in this appeal is what was the nature of the interest which the plaintiff obtained by his auction purchase in 1909-910 and whether he has a subsisting interest sufficient to entitle him to recover the property from the defendants who are in possession without any right whatever, v. Jatendro Mohun Tagore (1), that whether the whole estate or only the right, title and interest of the widow passes on an execution sale against the widow depends on the nature of the suit. If the suit is a personal claim against the widow only her interest passes, but if the suit is in respect of the family estate or upon a cause not merely personal against her then the whole inheritance passes by the execution sale. The decree in that particular case was for mesne profits. It is contended before us that a decree for arrears of rent must necessarily be personal whether the holding was ancestral or not, and two cases are cited in support of the argument. The first is the decision in Jiban Krishna Roy v. Brojo Lal Sen (2). The decision in that case was that in that particular case a sale in execution of a decree for arrears of rent passed against a Hindu daughter passed only her interest, but the decision was based on the circumstances of the case and the provisions of S. 64 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and is not authority for the proposition that a decree for arrears of rent must necessarily in all cases be treated as a personal liability. The second case is a decision of the Calcutta High Court in Kristo Govind Majumdar v. Hem Chandar Choudhry (3) which laid down that a decree for arrears of rent against a daughter in possession was a personal decree in which only her life interest could be sold. No reasons are given for the decision. The Court considered the case concluded by the Privy Council ruling in Baijun Doobey v. Brij Bhookun Lal (4).

It was laid down by the Privy Council in the case of Jugul Kishore

An examination of this ruling does not support the conclusion which the learned Judges drew from it. The case was decided on the ground that the sale which was held did not purport to be of anything more than the widow's interest, and the earlier cases cited by their Lordships in their judgment sufficiently show that it is possible for a sale under a rent decree against a widow to pass the entire estate.

There has been no finding by the Courts below as to whether the holding in respect of which the decree was obtained was a fixed-rate or an occupancy holding. In either case the zemindar might under S. 57 (a) of the Tenancy Act have enforced it by proceedings in ejectment and had he done so the entire tenure would have been lost to the family. The difference between the two is that if the holding was an occupancy holding the reversioners could not in any case have succeeded to it on Mt. Chaurasi's death unless they shared in the cultivation during her lifetime. It appears to us however that it is unnecessary to enter into this question for this reason that it is clear from the record that what purported to be sold under the decree was the entire tenure. If it be assumed that the decretal debt was not of a nature to support a sale of the entire interest the purchasers obtained a title voidable at the instance of the reversioners on the widow's death. Until challenged by them it is a good title and cannot he treated as a nullity by any trespasser who has succeeded in getting possession of the property. On this point we agree with the learned trial judge.

If authority is necessary we may refer to two recent decisions of the Bombay and Bihar High Court respectively, Sita Ram v. Khandu (5) and Kesho Prasad Singh v. Chandrika Prasad Singh (6). In this respect an execution sale against a widow which purports to pass the entire estate stands on the same footing as a voluntary alienation by her. In this view we set aside the decree of the Court below and restore that of the trial Court with costs in all Courts.

Daniels, J.—The question in this appeal is whether Hindu sons can recover joint family property which has been sold in execution of a mortgage decree against their father without showing that the mortgage debt was for illegal or immoral purposes. The mortgage was executed by the common ancestor Parmeshar Dayal in 1908. A suit was brought for sale on the basis of the mortgage and a final decree obtained on the 29th of August 1917. The sale took place on the 20th of January 1917 and was confirmed shortly after the institution of the present suit The auction purchaser was a stranger to the suit. The suit was filed on 2nd April 1919 by the sons and grandsons of Parmeshar Dayal for a declaration that the sale was not binding on them on the ground that the mortgage debt was incurred without any legal necessity.

The Court below has dismissed the suit on the rule laid down by Sir James Colvile in Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Prasad Singh (1) that where joint ancestral property has passed out of the joint family under a sale in execution of a decree for the father's debts, his sons cannot recover that property without showing that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted", and further that the purchasers at an execution sale, being strangers to the suit, if they have not notice that the debts were so contracted, are not bound to make enquiry beyond what appears on the face of the proceedings.

The appellants' contention is that this rule has been modified by the decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (2) and that it now only holds good when the father is dead at the time of the proceedings. In this case Parmeshar Dayal is still alive. The case is however exactly covered by the decision in the case of Sripat Singh v. Prodyot Kumar (3). This was also a case in which property was sold under a decree on a mortgage passed against the father to which the sons were not made parties. It also resembles the present case in that the father was alive at the time of suit. The case was governed by Mitakshara Law and the question for decision was whether the entire joint family property passed by the sale or only the interest of the father. The law was thus laid down by the Lord Chancellor: "The property in question was joint property governed by the Mitakshara law. By that law a judgment against the father of the family cannot be executed against the whole of the Mitakshara property if the debt in respect of which the judgment has been obtained was a debt incurred for illegal or immoral purposes. In every other event it is open to the execution creditor to sell the whole of the estate in satisfaction of the judgment obtained against the father alone". In face of this clear and recent pronouncement of their Lordships which exactly covers the facts of the present case it is useless to enter into speculations as to the inferences which may be drawn from the decision in Sahu Ram Chandra's case. The decision just quoted is on all fours with the facts before us; the decision in Sahu Ram Chandra's case is not. The same view has been taken in a number of cases of simple money decrees, in several of which Sripat Singh v. Prodyot Kumar (3) has been relied on. Such cases are;

1. Dalip Narain Singh v. Parmaoti Bibi (4); 2. Mohan Lal v. Bala Prasad (5); 3. Madhusudan Das v. Iswari Dayi Debi (6). It is impossible to distinguish these cases on the ground that they were cases of simple money decrees for the simple reason that the Privy Council case on which they relied was like the present case, a case of a mortgage decree.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the decree of the Court below is correct and we accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs, including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Landlord and Tenant—Transfer of house sites in towns by tenants valid.

Ajudhia Nath (for S. N. Sen)—for Appellants.

Gulzari Lal—for Respondents.

Ryves, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs for possession of certain sites in the town of Najibabad on the ground that the transfer of these sites to the transferees was illegal, the allegation being that the transferors were the raiyats of the plaintiffs who were the zamindars of the village. The main defence was that the defendants vendors were not the raiyats of the plaintiffs but were entitled as of right to dispose of the sites of their houses as they chose, and that the plaintiffs' suit was barred by twelve years' limitation. Both Courts have found that the muhalla of Zabtaganj which is now a part of the town of Najibabad belonged to the plaintiffs predecessors and that the plaintiffs therefore must be considered to be the zamindars; but both Courts have also found that the so-called raiyats are not tenants of the plaintiffs and pay them no rent and that they have exercised full proprietary rights over their houses and have transferred them freely as of right. They have accordingly dismissed the suit.

The plaintiffs in appeal really urge two points:—

(1) that it having been found that they are the zamindars, according to the well-known rule which applies to agricultural villages, the tenants have not ordinarily the rights to transfer the sites of their houses, and

(2) that in this case the evidence is not sufficient to enable the Court to find a custom in favour of the tenants.

It is proved that muhalla Zabtaganj whatever it was originally, has for more than fifty years formed part of the town of Najibabad and from 1866 has been under the control of the Municipal Board. It has been laid down in this Court that the presumptions which obtain in agricultural villages have no application to towns. We find that on the evidence on the record it was open to the Courts below to come to the conclusion to which they have, as to the right of the occupiers of houses to deal with sites, and we think there can be no doubt as to the correctness of this decision. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

K. N. Katju—for Appellants.

Iqbal Ahmad and Raza Ali—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The question for decision in these two connected appeals is as to the validity of a deed of wakf executed by Abdul Ali Khan and his wife on 26th March 1909. Abdul Ali Khan died on the 7th May 1917 and his wife shortly afterwards, and the present suit was brought by his brother Mohammad Ali Khan claiming possession of his legal share of the property as his heir under Mohammadan Law. Mohammad Ali Khan has died during the pendency of the proceedings and the appellants are his legal representatives. The parties to the suit are Sunnis. Mohammad Ali Khan in his plaint denied that any wakf was ever dedicated and urged further that if there was a wakf it was fictitious and illusory. That a wakf-nama was ex cuted has never been seriously disputed. The trial Court, however, treated it as a wakf which would not really take effect until after the deaths of Abdul Ali Khan and his wife. It accordingly treated it as valid only to the extent of one third of the property covered by it and decreed the suit as to the remainder. The learned Additional District Judge however, has upheld the wakf as valid and dismissed the suit. His findings are.

(1) That the dedication was substantial and real.

(2) That the dedication of the corpus was absolute and immediate;

(3) That the reservation of a life interest in the income, even if it were the entire income, which it is not, limited to the life of the two settlors, does not render the wakf illusory and testamentary.

The third finding is one of law. The first two findings are findings of fact, except in so far as the reality of the dedication may be a matter of legal inference from the facts found. The points which are taken in this Court are two: (1) That the wakf was invalid for want of delivery of possession, and (2) That the settlor and his wife retained complete control over the income during their joint lives and that this renders the wakf illusory and invalid either altogether, or in the alternativ , as held by the trial Court, for the period of their lives.

The only ground on which the wakf is assailed under the first head is that no application for mutation of names was made by Abdul Ali Khan, though he lived for 8 years after the execution of the deed of wakf. On the other hand it is proved that under the deed of wakf he appointed himself as first mutwalli and expressly declared that he was holding the property henceforth as mutwalli and not as owner. This according to the accepted rule of Mohammedan Law, is sufficient, and it was so held by this Court in Abdul Jalil Khan v. Obedullah Khan (1). This ground of attack, therefore fails.

As regards the second plea the suggestion that the wakf can be treated as a testamentary wakf may be rejected at the outset. A will is a document which may be cancelled by the testator at any time up to his death and only comes into operation at the latter event. Here there was an irrevocable dedication of the corpus of the property from the date of the deed. The provisions of the deed which are relied on as shewing that the dedication was illusory are set out in the judgment of the trial Court. They amount to this that during the lifetime of the settlor and his wife the amount to be spent on charitable and pious purposes was left entirely to their discretion both as to the sum to be expended and as to the purposes for which it was to be spent. They were to spend as much of the profits as they deemed proper on charitable and pious purposes recognised by Mohamedan law and the remainder for their support and no one was to have the right to call them to account. This state of things was, however, confined entirely to the lifetime of Abdul Ali Khan and his wife. It is not disputed that after their death the objects of the wakf were carefully specified and were proper objects, and that the mutwali was directly bound to spend the money on those objects. The question is, therefore, substantially that as stated by the learned Additional Judge, namely, whether the reservation practically amounti g to a life interest in the income as distinct from the corpus is sufficient to invalidate the wakf. This question was first raised in the case of Jaun Bebee v. Abdollah Barber (2) in the year 1838. In that case five questions were referred to the Moulvis for decision. The first question was.

"Whether according to Mohamedan Law an endowment to charitable uses is valid, when qualified by a reservation of the rents and profits to the donor himself during his life?"

The Moulvies alluded to the difference of opinion between the Imam Mohammad and the Imam Abu Yusuf on this point and agreed that the opinions of most of the learned upheld the view of Abu Yusuf who considered the wakf legal. Judgment was given accordingly. The same view was taken by the Bombay High Court in the case of Cassawally Jairabhai v. Currimbhoy Ebrahim (3). It was suggested that Jaun Bibee's case had been dissented from in the Full Bench case of Bikani Mia v. Suk Lal Poddar (4) but this is not the case. The judgment was cited at some length by Ghose J. (pp. 185-188) and also by Trevelyan J. (p. 223 of the report) and was distinguished from the case before them, but neither of the Judges pronounced it to be incorrect.

The appellants have also referred to the Privy Council ruling in Mahomed Ahsanullah Chowdhry v. Amarchand Kundu (5). This ruling is in no way contrary to the view taken by the Court below. The test laid down by the Privy Council for the validity of the endowment was that there must be a substantial dedication of the property to charitable uses at some time or other. Their Lordships also quote with approval the opinion of Kemp J. in an earlier case that the mere charge upon the profits of the estate of certain items which must in the course of time necessarily cease, being confined to one family, and which after the lapse will leave the whole property intact for the original purposes for which the endowment was made does not render the endowment invalid under the Mahomedan Law.

In this case there was admittedly an ultimate dedication of the entire property to religious and charitable uses. The weight of authority is entirely in favour of the validity of the wakf. We accordingly dismiss both the appeals with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Hindu Law—Widow—Surrender—Provision for maintenance does not vitiate.

Iqbal Ahmad—for Appellants.

S N. Sen and Harnandan Prasad—for Respondents.

Daniels, J.—The point for decision in this appeal is whether a gift of an estate by a widow in possession in favour of the next reversioner, which operates as an acceleration of the estate to the latter, is vitiated by its containing a provision for the maintenance of the widow. In this case Mt. Sumera Kunwar was in possession of the estate of her husband Rameshar Singh as a Hindu widow. On the 22nd April 1909 she made a gift of the entire estate to the sole surviving daughter Mt. Ramkali Kunwar. Mt Ramkali obtained possession and after her death the estate has been taken possession of by her two sons, the respondents. The original plaintiff Jai Mangal Singh, now represented by his sons was the son of another daughter of Rameshar Singh who was dead at the time of the gift to Mt. Ram Kali. The succession having opened on the death of the latter he claims his one-third share in the property as reversioner jointly with the defendants. His claim was decreed by the trial Court which found that the deed in favour of Mt. Ram Kali operated as an acceleration and that on her death the plaintiffs and the defendants were jointly entitled. The deed was attacked in both the Courts below on three grounds.

(1) That Mt. Parbati Kunwar was alive at the time of the gift.

(2) That the entire property was not included in the deed of gift.

(3) That the deed contained a provision for the maintenance of Mt. Sumera.

The trial judge rejected all the three objections. The learned District Judge agreed with him on the first two points but held that the provision for maintenance vitiated the deed and that Mt. Sumera being still alive the succession would only open on her death. It may be noted here that it has never been contended that the provision for maintenance was in any way excessive. The argument is that the mere fact of a provision for maintenance being made operates to prevent there being a surrender of the entire estate and ipso facto invalidates the deed.

The matter appears to us to be settled by two recent decisions of the Privy Council. The principle that an acceleration to be valid must be of the entire estate was laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rangasami Gounden v. Nachiappa Gounden (1). The lower Court following a decision of the Bombay High Court has held that any provision for maintenance is inconsistent with this principle. The Privy Council has however itself laid down that this is not the case. In Bhagwat Koer v. Dhanukdhari Prasad Singh (2) an agreement by the widow renouncing the estate and accepting maintenance for her life was held to operate as a valid surrender and to come within the rule laid down in Rangasami's case (1). The same view was taken in the case of Surreshwar Missir v. Maheshrani Misrain (3) where the widow surrendered the estate to the next reversioner, but the reversioner at the same time conveyed a small portion of it back to the widow as a provision for her maintenance. The former decision was relied on by the Madras High Court in the Full Bench Ruling in Angamuthu Chetti v. Varatharajulu Chetti (4), in which they also have held that a reasonable provision for the widow's maintenance does not affect the validity of surrender by her husband's death to the nearest reversioner. Even apart from authority this is we think a reasonable view to take. The widow so long as she is alive is entitled to be fed and clothed and some provision for her support must be made by the persons in possession of the estate. The matter appears to us to be concluded by the Privy Council rulings to which we have already referred. We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the trial Court with costs throughout including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

S A. No. 611 of 1922, Decided on 10th July 1923, from a decree of the Dt. J., Aligarh,

(a) Mahomedan Law—Marriage—Impotency—Meaning.

A man may be nominally or temporarily potent, due for instance to the use of certain medicinal drugs or other cause; or he may be potent as regards some women and not potent as regards his wife. [P. 117, C. 2]

(b) Mahomedan Law — Marriage — Consumation — Unruptured hymen — Presumption is in wife's favour.

If the hymen is intact (not even lacerated), the probabilities, except in the case of females below the age of puberty, are very strongly in favour of virginity; and the inference of virginity becomes almost certain, if the membrane is normal in position and structure and its apperture is of small size and undilatable, and if accompanying this condition of the hymen, the other signs of virginity are present, e.g, the condition of the breasts, the vagina and the fourchette. [P. 118, C. 1]

(c) Civil P. C., S. 100 — Finding based on opinion of expert is not always a finding of fact.

A finding based on the opinions of experts is not necessarily a finding based on facts proved or directly demonstrated. The opinions of experts are relevant but not conclusive as to the matters to which they relate; and where they materially differ their value and sufficiency may legitimately form the subject of consideration and scrutiny despite the acceptance of any of them by one Court or another. [P. 118, C. 1 & 2]

(d) Mahomedan Law —Marriage,—Dissolution on the ground of impotency—Procedure.

An impotent person is defined by the Mahomedan Law as one who is unable to have connection with a woman, though he has the natural organs; and a person who is able to have connection with an enjoyed woman, but not with a virgin, or with some women but not with others, whether the disability be by reason of disease or weakness, or original constitution, or advanced age, or enchantment, is still to be accounted impotent with respect to her with whom he cannot have connection, (Baillie's Mahomedan Law Vol. I p. 347 Ref.) The Mahommedan Law provides that where such is the case and a woman brings her husband before a Judge, and sues him, demanding a separation on the ground of impotency, and the fact whether the woman is an enjoyed woman or a virgin is disputed, the case is to be adjourned for a year, and if after the expiry of that year the woman should allege that she is still a virgin, an inspection by women is to be ordered, and if they should declare her to be an enjoyed woman, the word of her husband is to be taken with his oath; but if they should declare her to be a virgin, her word as to non-intercourse is to be received without oath. The intention obviously is that if such a claim is brought by a wife and is contested, an opportunity should be given to the husband to show that the charge against him is unfounded or that the alleged incapacity is removeable; and the woman should be required to appear again after a year before the judge in order to establish her claim to the relief she asks for. (Ibid p. 348). If the husband should consummate the marriage in the interval, the petition of the wife requires to be dismissed after the lapse of the period fixed by the judge. If he however, fail in his marital obligation, the wife is entitled to a divorce (Ameer Ali's Mahommedan Law Vol. II p. 598 and Tyabji's Mahomedan Law Vol. II p. 251 Ref. See also 21 B. 77.) But the wife must allow full access to her husband at all reasonable times whether she is living in the house of her parents or elsewhere during the year. [P. 118, C. 2 & P. 119, C. 1]

M. A. Aziz—for Appellant.

Iqbal Ahmed and Panna Lal — for Respondent.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—This and the connected appeal arise out of a suit brought by the husband for the restitution of conjugal rights and another brought by his wife for the annulment of her marriage with him. They were married on the 15th May 1914 when the woman was 13 years old and the husband about 3 or 4 years older. The woman lived in the house of her husband for about 6 years; but owing to subsequent differences she came away from his house and has been living with her parents since. Her allegation is that her husband was impotent and that she came to know of that fact after her marriage. A certain amount of medical evidence was examined on either side. On a consideration of that evidence the Court of first instance came to the conclusion that the husband was impotent and that that fact was not known to the wife when she was married. The lower appellate Court, however, thought that the medical evidence produced by the husband was entitled to a greater weight; and it decreed the claim brought by the husband for conjugal rights and dismissed that brought by the wife for the annulment of the marriage

The medical evidence, adduced by the woman, consisted of two lady doctors, one of whom, Miss Massey, is an Assistant Surgeon in charge of the Dufferin Hospital at Aligarh. Her statement was that she examined the girl on the 13th July 1921 and she thought that she was a virgin, as her hymen was intact. She admitted that the presence of the hymen was not a conclusive proof of virginity in every case but she explained that the hymen of this woman was complete and not torn in any way and that there were no symptoms, such as exist in rare cases, where in spite of co-habitation the hymen remains unaffected. The other lady doctor, who was examined, was Miss Bakhsh in charge of the Singhara Hospital at Hathras. She stated that she examined the woman on the 8th August 1921 and that in her opinion she was a virgin and has had no sexual intercourse with any man. She examined other parts of her body and found that the other symptoms noticeable were consistent with that opinion. On behalf of the plaintiff Major Barber, at one time Civil Surgeon of Aligarh, was examined. He testified to his having examined the husband on the 15th June 1921 and deposed that he found no physical or mental defects in him, his genital organs perfectly formed, and his general health good; and he thought that he was capable of sexual intercourse. Lieut. Mathews, who succeeded as Civil Surgeon of Aligarh, examined the husband on the 18th July 1921 and stated that he was not incapacitated by any mental or physical disease from having sexual intercourse, that he found no malformation in his male organ and that in his opinion he was normally capable of performing the sexual act He further said that the husband had a partial erection before him. Lt. Col. Ilias, another Civil Surgeon of Aligarh, stated that he examined the husband on the 8th September 1921 and found that he was potent and quite fit for sexual intercourse. He further said that no disease or deformity was found in his male organ, that could incapacitate him from sexual intercourse, and that the man had an erection before him quite full.

Where there is so much conflict in medical opinion it is not always easy to find which opinion is to be accepted in preference to the other. A man may, however, be nominally or temporarily potent, due for instance to the use of certain medicinal drugs or other cause; or he may be potent as regards some women and not potent as regards his wife. The latter fact was acknowledged by the medical witnesses, and is also recognized by the Mahomedan Law. It is material in any circumstances to note that according to the evidence of the lady doctors, the hymen of Mst. Altafan, the wife in question, was intact and there were no conditions, such as exist in exceptionally rare cases where continual cohabitation might exist and the hymen may yet remain unaffected. If the hymen was intact and there was nothing to show that the physical conditions of the hymen were of an abnormal character, very strong evidence is needed to rebut the presumption which arises from that state of things against the consummation of the marriage by the husband in spite of the wife having lived with him for about 6 years.

In Lewis v. Hayward (1) where after a co-habitation of fourteen years, a woman presented a petition for a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of the man's impotence and the report of the Inspectors and the medical evidence showed that the woman was virgo intacta et auta viro and there was no apparent defect or malformation in the man and the trial Court was satisfied that the marriage had never been completely consummated but was not satisfied that the non-consummation arose from the incapacity of the man, it was held by the House of Lords that the woman was entitled to a decree that the marriage was null and void on the ground that the co-habitation had been for a much more lengthened period than was required to raise the presumption against a husband and that the onus was thrown upon the husband either of disproving the facts or of showing by clear and satisfactory evidence that the result was attributable to other causes than his own impotency.

If the hymen is intact (not even lacerated), the probabilities, except in the case of females below the age of puberty, are according to Lyons, very strongly in favour of virginity; and the inference of virginity becomes almost certain, if the membrane is normal in position and structure and its apperture is of small size and undilatable, and if accompanying this condition of the hymen, the other signs of virginity are present. (Lyon's Medical Jurisprudence, sixth Edition page 264.) One of the lady doctors examined has referred in her evidence to these signs of virginity, including the condition of the breasts, the vagina and the fourchette.

There was no allegation that the husband has had no access to the woman. On the other hand the husband stated that he has had sexual intercourse with her on numerous occassions. The condition of the hymen, however renders his story wholly improbable.

It is urged on behalf of the husband that the finding of the lower appellate Court is a finding of fact; and however erroneous, it ought not to be disturbed; but a finding based on the opinions of experts is not necessarily a finding based on facts proved or directly demonstrated. It is a finding based on an examination and balancing of the opinions and views of experts or of the impressions produced on their minds by what they may have seen, heard, or observed, and as in the case of some species of evidence about custom, the sufficiency of the facts observed or of the inferences or opinions, formed, can always be examined to ascertain and determine their intrinsic value. The opinions of experts are relevant but not conclusive as to the matters to which they relate: and where they materially differ as in this instance, their value and sufficiency may legitimately form the subject of consideration and scrutiny despite the acceptance of any of of them by one Court or another.

An impotent person is defined by the Mahommedan Law as one who is unable to have connection with a woman, though he has the natural organs; and a person who is able to have connection with an enjoyed woman, but not with a virgin, or with some women but not with others, whether the disability be by reason of disease, or weakness, or original constitution, or advanced age, or enchantment, is still to be accounted impotent with respect to her with whom he cannot have connection, (Baillie's Mahommedan Law Vol. 1 p. 347). The Mahommedan Law provides that where such is the case and a woman brings her husband before a judge, and sues him, demanding a separation on the ground of impotency, and the fact whether the woman is an enjoyed woman or a virgin is disputed, the case is to be adjourned for a year, and if after the expiry of that year the woman should allege that she is still a virgin, an inspection by women is to be ordered, and if they should declare her to be an enjoyed woman, the word of her husband is to be taken with his oath; but if they should declare her to be a virgin, her word as to non-intercourse is to be received without oath. The intention obviously is that if such a claim is brought by a wife and is contested, an opportunity should be given to the husband to show that the charge against him is unfounded or that the alleged incapacity is removable; and the woman should be required to appear again after a year before the Judge in order to establish her claim to the relief she ask for. (Ibid p. 348). If the husband should consumate the marriage in the interval, the petition of the wife requires to be dismissed after the lapse of the period fixed by the Judge. If he, however, fail in his marital obligation, the wife is entitled to a divorce (Ameer Ali's Mahommedan Law Vol. II p. 593 and Tyabji's Mahommedan Law p 251).

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the procedure enjoined by the Mahommedan Law in regard to the disposal of such a claim is not obligatory on the British Courts; but the provision aforesaid is intended to operate as a safeguard against error or a hasty or precipitate annulment of the marriage where a removal of the complaint or a disproof thereof is possible; and like the provisions relating to the preliminary demands requisite to validate a claim for the enforcement of the pre-emptive right, it must be treated as an essential part of the Mahommedan Law, regulating the annulment of marriages. In a similar case in which the parties were governed by the Mahommedan Law (21 Bom. 77) an interlocutory order was passed, postponing the annulment of the marriage for a year in order that the parties might be allowed an opportunity of resuming co-habitation during that period, if that was possible.

The right of a wife to claim a judicial divorce on the ground of the impotency of her husband is contingent on her succeeding to establish that she did not know of his impotency at the time of her marriage and that it has not since then been removed; but as pointed out by Wilson, the divorce must remain suspended for a year after the decree in order that it might be ascertained whether the defect is removable. (Wilson's Mahommedan Law 5th Edition p. 145).

A prima facie case having been made out, the wife can be granted a decree nisi, which can be confirmed after a year, in case the husband is found to be physically unable to perform the marital obligation during the interval; but she must allow full access to her husband at all reasonable times whether she is living in the house of her parents or elsewhere but not outside Aligarh. In view of the present litigation, it would be risky and undesirable to compel her to leave the protection of her parents and live in the house of the plaintiff or his relations. An adjournment of the appeal really can serve no purpose, as the final enquiry has to be made by the Court of first instance.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and a decree nisi passed in favour of the plaintiff, Musammat Altafan, for the annulment of her marriage with the defendant Ibrahim; but this decree will not be made absolute till a year from this date, during which period, whether she lives in the house of her parents or elsewhere but not outside Aligarh, she should allow full access to the defendant at all reasonable times to exercise his marital rights as her husband. If after the expiry of the said period she satisfies the Court that the husband continues to be impotent and physically unable to perform his marital obligation, she will be entitled to have this decree made absolute. But if she fails to do so, the decree nisi will be discharged and the suit will be dismissed. An application for the above purpose will have to be made to the Court of first instance, to which the suit will be remanded for disposal in accordance with the directions above given. The costs here and hitherto will abide the result.

Appeal allowed.

P. C. A. No. 6 of 1923, Decided on 21st June, 1923.

Civil P. C., S. 109—Final order—Order of remand merely to enquire into details is final.

In execution of a mortgage decree the decree-holder applied to the Court below for the preparation of a decree for unsatisfied balance, under O. 34, R. 6. The judgment-debtors objected that the application for a decree under O. 34, R. 6 was statute barred. The execution Court upheld this contention and dismissed the application of the decree-holders. On appeal the High Court held that the application was within time. The order of the Court below was therefore set aside and the execution Court was ordered to re-admit the application of the decree holders on to its file of pending applications and to dispose of it according to law.

Held, that it is not certain that the order of the High Court might not fairly be described as a final order within S. 109. Certificate was granted especially since the remand order went to the root of the case. 17 All. 112 Foll. 6 A. L. J. 786 and 33 All. 391 Dist.

Piggott, J.—This is an application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council against an order of this Court, dated the 4th of December 1922. There are materials on the record quite sufficient to show that the value of the subject matter in dispute between the parties in the proceedings resulting in this Court's order above referred to exceeded Rs. 10,000. This Court did not affirm the decision of the Court below. What is objected to is that the order in question is neither a decree nor a final order within the meaning of S. 109 (a) of the Code of Civil Procedure. On behalf of the applicant it is contended that the order in question is at any rate a final order within the meaning of the clause above referred to. Apart from this, it is contended that under the circumstances the case ought to be certified as a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council, merely on the ground that it is an appeal from an order of this Court, and any difficulty as to whether the order in question was or was not a final order could be avoided by applying the provisions of S. 109 (c) above referred to. It is necessary to examine the circumstances under which this matter came to the Court. It was an execution appeal arising out of a mortgage decree. The decree holders were the appellants in this Court. They had obtained execution of their mortgage decree in a somewhat unusual, but perfectly lawful, manner. They had exhausted the whole of the property covered by the decree, and they alleged that a very considerable portion of the decree still remained unsatisfied. They applied to the Court below for the preparation of a decree covering this unsatisfied balance, under the provisions of Order 34 rule 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The office report prepared at the time the application was made is on this record. It is to the effect that the amount due under the decree on the date of the said report, namely the 23rd of May 1918, was Rs. 32,179-7-6, and that the total amount realisad by sale of the mortgaged property was only 18,600. We do not say that the parties are necessarily bound by these figures. They may require further investigation in the Court below. We refer to them however as showing that prima facie the amount of the subject matter in dispute was considerably in excess of Rs 10,000. The judgment debtors objected that the application for a decree under Order 34 rule 6 was statute barred under the appropriate article of the Indian Limitation Act. The execution Court upheld this contention and dismissed the application of the decree-holders. On appeal, a Bench of this Court held that the application was within time. The order of the Court below was therefore set aside and the execution Court was ordered to re-admit the application of the decree holders on to its file of pending applications and to dispose of it according to law. Under the circumstances this amounted to a direction that a decree under Order 34 rule 6 should be prepared, the details of which were left for the execution Court to settle. It is against this order that the judgment debtors now desire to appeal to His Majesty in Council.

We have been referred to two cases of this Court namely Baijnath Das v. Sohan Bibi (1) and Ahmad Husain v. Govind Krishna Narain (2) in which leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council against an order passed by this Court under Order 41 rule 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure was refused, on the ground that the order sought to be appealed against in each case was neither a decree nor a final order. Authority on the other side is to be found in the case of Mazhar Husain v. Mt. Bodha Bibi (3). In that case leave to appeal was refused by this Court against an order passed under the section of the former Civil Procedure Code corresponding to order 41 rule 23 of the present Code, but special leave to appeal was granted by His Majesty in Council. The learned Judges of this Court who decided the case of Baijnath Das v. Sohan Bibi (1) distinguished Mazhar Husain's case (3) from the one then before them, on the ground that the order passed by this Court in Mazhar Husain's case (3) decided a point which went to the very root of the case, all the other defences raised being of a subordinate character. Clearly the learned Judges were of opinion that, in the case of an order of remand by this Court of which it could be said that it had determined the only really substantial question in issue between the parties, the precedent set by their Lordships in Mazhar Husain's case (3) ought to be followed and leave to appeal granted. The present seems to us such a case; it is clearly distinguishable from either of the two cases above referred to in which leave to appeal was refused. It is only necessary to glance at the reports in those two cases to see that the facts were materially different. In the case now before us this Court disposed of one substantial objection raised by the judgment debtors to the decree holder's application. The case was sent back to the execution Court because the steps which remained to be taken, in order that a proper decree under order 34 rule 6 might be prepared, could more conveniently be taken in that Court. We are by no means certain that under these circumstances the order of this Court might not fairly be described as a final order within the meaning of that expression as used in S. 109 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In any case we are satisfied that we ought to follow the precedence set in Mazhar Husain's case (3) and grant the certificate asked for. We order accordingly.

Application allowed.

Civil P. C., S. 115—Order under O. 23 R. 1—Order admittedly wrong—No revision lies.

Judgment.—This is an application for revision of an order of the learned Munsif of Shikohabad granting permission to withdraw a suit under Order 23 rule 1 with permission to file a fresh suit. The application for withdrawal was made after a considerable amount of evidence had been recorded on both sides. The reasons given for the application were two.

(1) The non-joinder of a person who is alleged by the defendants to be a co-sharer in the holding in dispute to be a necessary party.

(2) The fact that a patwari whom the plaintiff wished to produce as a rebutting witness had been won over by the other side.

For these reasons the plaintiff alleged that the suit was liable to fail and he asked for permission to withdraw it as stated above.

The second reason was admittedly not a proper reason for allowing withdrawal of the suit. The learned Munsif however has not acted on this reason; he has acted on the first reason, saying that in his opinion misjoinder of parties was a formal defect coming within Order 23 rule 1 and that as the defendants had themselves alleged Murlidhar the person in question to be a necessary party they were not in a position to dispute the point. On the merits I consider that the order passed by the learned Munsif was an unfortunate order. The formal defect of non-joinder of Murlidhar might easily have been cured by impleading him which could be done at any time before the case was decided. It is probable therefore that the real reason for the application was the one of which the Munsif takes no notice in his order. The question which arises in this case and which has been argued before me is whether under these circumstances any revision lies There is ample authority for the proposition that this Court has power to revise such orders where the lower Court has not exercised a judicial discretion in passing them. There is equally strong authority including the cases of Ratan Lal v. Muhd. Hamid Ullah (1) and Jhunku Lal v. Bisheshar Das (2) for the proposition that where the lower Court has applied its mind to the question whether sufficient cause under Order 23 rule 1 is established, no revision lies whether its actual decision is right or wrong. It is clear that the present case comes within the latter principle. The Court's decision may have been wrong-in my opinion it was-but the learned Munsif undoubtedly did apply his mind to the question whether there was a formal defect by reason of which the suit was liable to fail and came to the conclusion that there was. I must therefore hold that no revision lies and I dismiss the present application. Under the circumstances I make no order as to costs.

Application dismissed.

E. S. A. No 38 of 1923, Decided on 13th June 1923, against the decree of the Dt. J, Benares, D/- 5th October 1922.

Civil P. C., Ss. 47 and 151 - Order as to costs of a commissioner - Proceedings to execute such order is not a proceeding between parties in execution—Proper procedure.

An order passed by the Court in favour of a commissioner for the payment of costs connected with the execution of a commission which were recoverable from the parties to the suit may be enforced by the Court under the inherent powers conferred upon it by S. 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure in such manner as may be thought proper. Any proceedings taken in enforcement of such an order is not a proceeding between the parties to a suit for the execution of a decree, within the meaning of S. 47. [P. 123, C. 2]

K. Verma—for Appellants.

K. N. Katju—for Respondent.

Judgment.—In a suit for partition a preliminary decree was passed appointing a Commissioner to make a partition and to ascertain the debts and outstanding amounts and the capital and stock-in-trade of a certain shop and to take them into account in framing his proposals. That decree was the subject matter of an appeal to this Court. While that appeal was pending, the Commissioner proceeded with his work and found that a sum of Rs. 100, settled as payable to him for executing the Commission, was insufficient in consideration of his labour. He therefore, when submitting his accounts and the list of the properties proposed to be partitioned moved the Court to award him Rs. 800 as his fees for the work he had done. The Court thereupon ordered that Rs. 600 should be paid to him by the plaintiffs and Rs. 200 by the defendant and that if the appeal from the preliminary decree was successful, the defendant would be entitled to recover the latter sum from the plaintiffs. It further ordered that a decree for the amount should be prepared in favour of the Commissioner against the parties to the suit. This order was passed on the 22nd of March 1919; but no decree was actually prepared in pursuance of the above order in favour of the Commissioner. The plaintiffs made default in the payment, except of a small portion, of the money.

The appeal from the preliminary decree eventually succeeded and the entire claim was ultimately dismissed by the Court of first instance on the 15th of April 1920. In the closing or final decree then prepared the direction of the 22nd of March 1919 regarding the payment of remuneration due to the Commissioner by the plaintiffs was not embodied. Meanwhile the plaintiffs obtained an order, adjudicating them insolvents, on the 24th of March 1920. They subsequently obtained an order of discharge on the 26th of January 1921. During the insolvency proceeding no mention is said to have been made by them of the amount which they were liable to pay to the Commissioner and in the schedule of proved debts prepared the amount due to the Commissioner is not stated to have been shown.

An application has since been made by the Commissioner for the execution of the order of the 22nd March 1919 by the arrest of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs opposed this application on the ground among others that having been declared insolvents and discharged they were not liable to arrest in lieu of a debt proveable in the insolvency proceeding within the meaning of Ss. 34 and 44 of the Provincial Insolvency Act (Act No 5 of 1920). When this objection came up for hearing the plaintiffs judgment-debtors stated that they were not in a position to pay any money at that time but would be able to do so after they start some business and earn some money. The Commissioner agreed to allow them time for the payment of the money due to him. The learned Subordinate Judge acceded to the request of the judgment-debtors for the time and allowed them two years to pay the money, but at the same time he disallowed their objection. The judgment-debtors appealed to the District Judge who dismissed their appeal, holding that no appeal was entertainable under S. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The preliminary question for consideration here is whether S. 47 has any application to the case. As has already been pointed out there was no decree prepared in the case, in fact the person who was seeking redress was not even a party to the suit in which the order sought to be executed, was passed The order in question was virtually an order passed by the Court in favour of one of its officers for the payment of costs connected with the execution of a Commission which were recoverable from the parties to the suit. An order of that character may be enforced by the Court under the inherent powers conferred upon it by S. 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure in such manner as may be thought proper. Any proceeding taken in enforcement of such an order is not a proceeding between the parties to a suit for the execution of a decree, within the meaning of S 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the learned District Judge was right in holding that no appeal lay to the Court below and no appeal would similarly lie here. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

F. A. Nos. 40 and 50 of 1923, Decided on 8th June 1923, from the order of the Sub.J., Azamgarh, D/ 15th December 1922.

Wajib-ul-arz—Evidentiary value—Presumption as to its being a record of custom may be rebutted.

Prima facie an entry in the wajib-ul-arz is to be treated as an entry of a custom. But this presumption is liable to be overthrown either by external or internal evidence. 16 A. L. J. 879 Foll. [P. 124, C. 2

A. Sanyal—for Appellant.

S. N. Sen and U. S. Bajpai—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.—Both these appeals arise out of suit No. 76 of 1920 instituted in the Court of the Munsif of Azamgarh by two plaintiffs Sultan Ahmad and Iqbal Ahmad. The suit was a suit for pre-emption and various parties were impleaded as defendants. One of these parties was Sheikh Muhammad Ali who was impleaded as defendant second party. He is the purchaser of the property and he is the appellant in F. A. F. O. No. 40 of 1923. The other sets of defendants were Muzaffar Husain the vendor first party and two other parties who were rival pre-emptors and who had instituted separate suits for pre-emption.

The Court of first instance held that the plaintiffs could not succeed as no proof of a custom of pre-emption was forthcoming. The lower appellate Court reversed this decision of the Court of first instance and having done so remanded the suit for disposal on the merits.

We now have these two appeals, one by Sheikh Muhammad Ali the purchaser who was impleaded as defendant second party, and the other, namely, appeal No. 50 of 1923, by Muhammad Junaid and others, who were impleaded, as defendants third party. These last were, as we have said, rival pre-emptors.

It seems to us that the question which arises for decision in this case is covered by authority. It is not to be denied that there has been a great deal of uncertainty in the law as laid down in various decisions of this Court but an attempt has been made in order to secure consistency and it is above all things necessary in cases of the present kind to adhere as far as possible to the principle of stare decisis.

We have, in this case, after hearing the arguments of the learned counsel, determined that the rule of law laid down in the judgment reported in 16 A. L. J. 879 shall be followed in the present case. That rule has been applied in another case reported in 21 A. L. J. 378 and also in Matadin Tewari v. Suraj Bali Singh (1) decided by the pre-emption bench on the 16th of March last.

It seems to us that the case is for all material purposes on all fours with the case reported in 16 A. L. J. What do we find?. The plaintiffs rely upon a wajib-ul-arz for proof of the custom of premption and the question which has to be decided is whether this wajibularz affords reliable evidence of the existence of a custom. It need not be denied that prima facie an entry in the wajibularz is to be treated as an entry of a custom. That has been laid down again and again and has the authority of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It has however always been held that this presumption is liable to be overthrown either by external or internal evidence. In the present case we find clause (14) of the wajibularz which sets out in some detail the various things which are to happen when a co-sharer in a village desires to transfer property either by way of an out and out sale or by way of conditional sale or by way of mere hypothecation. We have a scheme by which provision is made for pre-emption of sales and also for pre-emption in respect of mortgages. Then we are met with a clause which strikes one as being a peculiar one to find in an entry purporting to be an entry of a custom. It is laid down that in cases where a mortgage has been made by a co-sharer and where that co-sharer is unwilling to redeem the mortgage created by him at the time when redemption may be sought, other co-sharers in a certain order may come forward and demand and get redemption of the mortgage and may take over the property and keep it for themselves. We cannot put any other interpretation on the language of this document. It follows therefore that here we have a clause which provides clearly that persons who are strangers to a mortgage have a right of redemption and have a right to recover the property from the mortgagee and hold for themselves after they have paid the mortgage. It was a clause of this kind which attracted attention in the case decided in 16 A. L. J. 879. This was one reason why in that case it was held that the recital in the wajibularz should not be treated as a recital of custom. Another peculiar feature of the wajibularz in this case is the provision which it makes to regulate the sums which may be demanded when property is either mortgaged or sold. So far as we understand the provisions relating to this matter, it is laid down that when property is sold outright the price is to be regulated on the basis of 1 p. c. of the profits. In a case where the transfer is by way of mortgage, the sum to be advanced by way of mortgage is to be based upon a calculation of 8 annas per cent on the profits.

This is indeed a remarkable provision to be found in a record which purports to be a record of custom. It is in our opinion quite impossible that matters of this kind should form the subject of custom and it is preposterous to say that any custom which the law will recognize can grow up which prescribes for all time the prices at which immovable property in villages in these Provinces is to be sold. If there were no other ground a custom of this kind would be condemned at once on the ground that it is unreasonable.

We find therefore a close analogy between the facts of the present case and the facts of the case in 16 A.L.J. 879 and following the principle of stare decisis we have come to the conclusion that no custom has been established in this case. We hold therefore that the decision of the first Court was right and that the decision of the lower appellate Court is wrong. It follows therefore that these two appeals, Nos. 40 and 50 of 1923 must be allowed and the order of the Court of first instance restored. The appellants in both the cases now before us are entitled to their costs including in this Court fees, if any, on the higher scale.

Appeals allowed.

Civ. Rev. No. 44 of 1923, Decided on 19th June, 1923, from the order of the Small Cause Court, Deoria, D/-15th November, 1922.

Agra Tenancy Act, S. 36—Landlord going to grove himself and taking mangoes—Suit lies in Small Cause Court and not Revenue Court.

A suit brought by plaintiff grove holder on the allegation that the defendant Zemindar being entitled to one-fourth of the fruits of the grove wrongfully appropriated one-half of the fruits is cognizable by Small Cause Court.

The verb 'to exact' implies something which the tenant has been compelled to pay against his will and does not apply to a case in which the landlord has gone to the grove and gathered the produce for himself.

Haribans Sahai—for Appellant.

N. Upadhya—for Respondent.

Daniels, J.—This application raises a question of jurisdiction. The plaintiff is a grove holder and the defendant the zamindar. The suit was brought on the allegation that the defendant being entitled to one-fourth of the fruits of the grove had wrongfully appropriated one-half of the fruits. The suit was filed in the Small Cause Court claiming the value of the fruits wrongfully appropriated. The defence was that the suit was cognisable only by the Revenue Court, being a suit contemplated by S. 36 of the Tenancy Act and that therefore the jurisdiction of the Civil Court was ousted by S. 167 of the same Act. S. 36 covers the claims by a tenant from whom any sum or produce had been exacted by his landlord in excess of the amount recoverable from him as an arrear of rent. The learned Judge of the Court below framed an issue on the question of jurisdiction but omitted to decide it. The plaintiff's answer to the objection however is that the verb "to exact" implies something which the tenant has been compelled to pay against his will and does not appy to a case in which the landlord has gone to the grove and gathered the produce for himself. It is not disputed that the produce of a grove which the grove holder is liable to render to the zamindar comes within the definition of rent, this having been held in more than one case e. g Raghubir Rai v. Matho (1). The dictionary meaning of the verb "to exact" is in accordance with the interpretation placed on it by the respondent. The primary meaning as given in Murray's Oxford Dictionary is "to demand and enforce payment of." It does not cover the direct appropriation of produce on the spot. I have been referred to an old decision in Gurreeboolah Puramanick v. Fukeer Mahomed Khiloo (2) in which the same view was taken. I have little doubt that the intention of the framers of the Tenancy Act was to include such a case as the present within the jurisdiction of the Revenue Court, and if S. 36 as framed does not cover it, it is merely because the possibility of such a case was not thought of at the time when the section was drafted. I must however interpret the section as it stands.

In the course of the argument an alternative plea has been put forward to the effect that the suit was excluded from the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court by Article 35 (II) or Article (43A) of the second schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Court Act. This plea is an after-thought and was not taken in the grounds of revision. Moreover after reading the plaint I do not find that the allegations made therein clearly amount to a criminal offence. The revision therefore fails and I accordingly dismiss it with costs.

Application dismissed.

Daniels, J.—This is an application for revision under the following circumstances. The suit was one on a pronote. In the course of the suit the defendant agreed to abide by the oath of one of the plaintiffs Mithu Lal. On a subsequent date before the oath could be administered he wished to withdraw from his application on the ground that Mithu Lal had been won over by the other plaintiff, his son, to swear a false oath. A witness was put in to prove this fact but both the Courts below have concurred in rejecting his evidence as false. The plaintiff Mithu Lal took the required oath and on the basis of his evidence the learned Munsif decreed the suit. The defendant appealed to District Judge The District Judge agreed with the Munsif as to the worthlessness of the evidence of collusion but remanded the case to the Munsif to take further evidence on the facts. On the basis of this evidence the learned judge came to the conclusion that in reality there was no consideration for the pronote and that the statement made by Mithu Lal on oath was false. From this he came to the conclusion that there must have been collusion between the two plaintiffs. Such a procedure on the part of the District Judge cannot be supported. It has the effect of entirely nullifying the agreement made by the defendant to abide by Mithu Lal's oath. The oath to be taken was in the ordinary form and may not be specifically covered by Ss. 8 and 9 of the Oaths Act. There is authority of this Court in the cases of Muhammad Ashgar Ali Khan v. Imtiaz Ali (1) and Kesho Ram v. Peare Lal (2), that this does not affect the validity of the agreement. If the Court notwithstanding such an agreement is to be at liberty to enter into evidence as to the truth or falsehood of the statement made, the effect in substance is to wipe out the agreement altogether; it might not as well have been entered into. When a party agrees to abide by the oath of the other party or of any particular witness he clearly takes the risk of the witness swearing falsely. What he says in effect is "whatever this witness states on oath I am prepared to assent as true and to have the case decided on the basis of it" The Court below has in this case acted illegally and with material irregularity in entering into evidence on the question of consideration and in setting aside the decree of the Munsif. I accordingly allow the present application and setting aside the decree of the learned District Judge restore the decree of the Munsif. Under the special circumstances of the case I make no order as to costs in this Court.

Judgment.—In this case, as the result of a redemption suit, a decree was passed giving the right of redemption to the mortgagor, and stating that Rs. 3 8 2 were surplus profits in the hands of the mortgagee under the terms of the usufructuary mortgage. That sum was arrived at after investigation by a Commissioner but he only took the cultivation down to the 25th of June 1920. Possession was given on the 2nd February 1922. A Preliminary decree was passed on the 18th November 1921, on which date the Commissioner had satisfied himself that there was a sum of money due from the mortgagee to the mortgagor; but he appears on that day to have been given directions by the Judge with regard to the ascertainment of certain sums. On that very date the learned Judge's attention was called to the terms of Order, 34, probably rules 7 and 8 and possibly 9 and thereupon on the order sheet he made a statement that "when the decree is prepared the account will have to be made up to date." From the moment of making that memorandum on the 18th of November 1921 the matter was overlooked, with the result that the figure of Rs. 3,812 was ultimately decided by him to be the amount of surplus profits which the mortgagee should pay to the mortgagor. The mortgagor now comes before the Court and, having quite properly laid emphasis upon the memorandum of the 18th of November 1921, says that the failure to calculate the surplus profits from the 25th of June 1920 to the 2nd of February 1922 can fairly and properly be described as one of those mistakes, errors or omissions which are referred to in S. 152 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and which can be cured even though the parties have a pending appeal to this High Court. We think that this is right, and, on a review of the whole circumstances it being obvious, as the matter stands at present, that the Subordinate Judge was of opinion that surplus profits were due from the mortgagee to the mortgagor, that we ought to order an enquiry so that the sum of money which is finally found due from the mortgagee, to the mortgagor may be such as is contemplated by the terms of Order 34. We therefore direct an enquiry as to the surplus profits, if any which the mortgagee should pay the mortgagor for the period from the 25th of June 1920 to the 2nd February 1922 during which time the mortgagee was in possession. That enquiry should proceed in the lower Court with due expedition and if it happens that the decretal amount which at present stands at Rs. 3,812 undergoes any alteration, either party may without further application amend within 28 days of the decision of the Subordinate Court their present memorandum of appeal to this Court in any way they think fit, provided such amendment relates solely to this matter which we are deciding today. If necessary an application should be made in this Court to stay the hearing of the appeals if it should happen that the enquiry as to the amount of surplus profits, if any, is not concluded before the appeals come to this Court the object being that when the appeals do come to this Court the matters in controversy right down to the 2nd of February 1922 can be settled once and for all between the parties. The costs of this application will be costs in the cause.

As regards the second application the above order supercedes the order of stay passed on the 2nd of November 1922.

Criminal Ref. No. 178 of 1923, Decided on 16th May 1923, from the S. J., Mainpuri, D/-16th March 1923.

Public Gambling Act (III of 1867) S. 6—Legality of warrant—Presumption as to eague and indefinite warrant is not legal.

The Superintendent of Police received eredible information that a common gaming house was maintained by Puttu Lal son of Changi Mal by caste Brahmin resident of Mainpuri. He issued a warrant for the search of the house of Puttu Lal but omitted to get the boundaries of that house noted in the warrant or to enter to whom it was addressed. The caste of Puttu Lal was also misdescribed. The Sub-Inspector to whom the warrant in question was handed over waited for a suitable opportunity to make the search. He corrected the caste of Puttu Lal in the warrant with his own hand and went to the house of Puttu Lal and made a search.

Held, that the erroneous description of the caste in the original warrant may not be very material, but the omission to address it to a definite police officer and to describe the house by its boundaries or number, renders the warrant vague and indefinite, and it cannot be said that under that warrant the officer making the search was authorised to make it. The warrant in question cannot therefore be regarded as legal and the presumption authorised by S. 6 cannot be raised. [P. 129, C. 1 & 2]

Kanhaiya Lal. J.—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of Mainpuri in a case in which certain persons have been convicted of an offence under S. 4 of Act No. III of 1867 and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 10 each. It appears that on the 18th October 1922 the Superintendent of police received credible information that a common gaming house was maintained by Puttu Lal son of Changi Mal by caste Brahmin resident of Mainpuri. Puttu Lal was employed as a miscellaneous clerk in the Court of the Subordinate Judge f Mainpuri, but at that time he was on leave. The Superintendent of Police issued a warrant for the search of the house of Puttu Lal but omitted to get the boundaries of that house noted in the warrant or to enter to whom it was addressed. The caste of Puttu Lal was also misdescribed. The sub Inspector to whom the warrant in question was handed over waited for a suitable opportunity to make the search. On the 2nd of December 1922 he is said to have received information from Sannu, an ekka driver, that gambling was going on in the house of Puttu Lal. He corrected the caste of Puttu Lal in the warrant with his own hand and went to the house of Puttu Lal and made a search with the result that certain instruments of gaming were found in the house and certain persons were arrested with moneys in their possession. The main question for consideration in the case was whether the warrant of search was legal. There was a further question as to how far a presumption could be raised that the house in question was used as a common gaming house. The learned Sessions Judge finds that the warrant was illegal inasmuch as the boundaries of the house to be searched were not given therein, and it was not addressed to any definite police officer. He further finds that the caste of Puttu Lal as originally entered in the warrant was misdescribed and that the Sub-Inspector who executed the warrant was not authorized to correct it on his own initiative. S. 5 of the Public Gambling Act (No. III of 1867) provides that if the Superintendent of Police has reason to believe that any house is used as a common gaming house he may either himself enter or by warrant authorise any officer of police not below such rank as the Local Government shall appoint in this behalf, to enter such a house, and to take into custody all persons who may be found therein and seize all instruments of gaming, moneys and securities reasonably suspected to have been used or intended to be used for the purpose of gaming, which are found therein. Where such a warrant is issued, the law raises a presumption. until the contrary is made to appear, that such house is used as a common gaming house and that the persons found therein are there present for the purpose of gaming.

The house in question was the residential house of Puttu Lal and his brother. The erroneous description of the caste in the original warrant may not be very material but the ommissionto address it to a definite police officer and to describe the house by its boundaries or number, renders the warrant vague and indefinite, and it cannot be said that under that warrant the officer making the search was authorised to make it. The Superintendent of Police says that he does not remember who took the warrant to him for signature or to whom it was handed over by him. The warrant in question cannot therefore be regarded as legal and the presumption authorised by S. 6 of the Public Gambling Act (No. III of 1867) cannot be raised. In fact Puttu Lal who was convicted by the trying magistrate on a charge of keeping a common gaming house has already been acquitted by the learned Sessions Judge. The conviction of the other persons cannot therefore be upheld. The reference is accepted and the convictions and sentences passed on the applicants are set aside. The fines, if realised will be refunded.

Judgment.—This is an application for revision of a decree of the Judge of the Small Cause Court, Cawnpore, so far as it awards a sum of Rs. 59 against the applicant firm Dwarka Das Ajodhia Prasad on the basis of a hundi The hundi was drawn on the applicants and the whole question so far as their liability went was whether they accepted it or not. The learned

Judge of the Court below finds that the bundi was not accepted as required by S. 7 of the Act, namely by the drawee signing his assent on the bill, but he finds on oral evidence that the applicants did accept it verbally and on this basis he has decreed the suit against them. He relies on a statement in the fourth edition of Chalmer's Negotiable Instruments Act page 190 that. "Possibly by local custom hundis may be accepted verbally." The learned Judge has however overlooked the fact that any such local custom must be specifically set up and proved by evidence, and neither of these things was done in this case. On the findings of the Court below it appears to me that no decree could legally be passed against the applicants and I accordingly allow the revision and set aside the decree of the Court below so far as it is against the applicants. As the Court below has found that the merits of the case are largely with the opposite party I allow no costs to the applicants either here or in the Court below.

Criminial P. C., Ss. 423 and 32–Power to vary sentence is measured by trial Court's powers.

The powers of an appellate Court to vary a sentence must be measured by those of the Court of first instance. 7 N. L. R. 109 Ref.

The Asstt. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

The following is the Referring Order:—This is an application for revision of an appellate order of the Joint Magistrate of Roorkee, dated 1st February 1923. The applicant was tried and convicted by a second class Magistrate on a charge under S. 406 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to three months simple imprisonment. The learned Magistrate on appeal affirmed the conviction, but varied the sentence passed. He altered it from one of three months' simple imprisonment to a fine of four hundred rupees. The second class Magistrate who tried the case could have imposed a fine of two hundred rupees only under S. 32 Criminal Procedure Code. It is argued that the powers of an appellate Court to vary a sentence must be measured by those of the Court of first instance. A ruling of the Judicial Commissioner's Court Nagpur. 7 N. L. R. 109—12 Cr. L. J. 444 has been referred to. I think that the argument cannot be refuted. Apart from this, six months' imprisonment must be deemed to be equivalent to two hundred rupees' fine in view of S. 32 (1) (b), and it is a moot question if the imposition of a fine of four hundred rupees would not be an enhancement of the sentence. Cf. Empress v. Meda (1). It will be noticed that in the appellate order which is attacked the imprisonment in default of the payment of this fine has been made rigorous while the original sentence was one of simple imprisonment. It was said in Peman v. Empress (2) that the imposition of solitary confinement is an enhancement even though the sentence of imprisonment be reduced. On the same principle, the substitution of rigorous imprisonment might be held to be an enhancement. But I take it that lower appellate Court, in varying the sentence, was bound by the limitations imposed by S. 32 on the trial Court. On the facts, which are seldom open to re-examination in revision, I see no good ground for interference. I would refer the order to the Hon'ble High Court, as I hold that the joint Magistrate's order was ultra vires and therefore illegal.

Judgment.—We accept this reference and restore the sentence to the original three months simple imprisonment given by the Magistrate who tried the case. The fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Reference answered in the affirmative.

Penal Code, S. 379—Water in pipes is subject of theft.

Water when conveyed in pipes and so reduced into possession can be subject of theft. [P 131, C 2]

Sailanath Mookerjee—for Applicant.

The Asstt. Govt. Adovocate—for the Crown.

Daniels, J.—This revision raises the question whether water in Municipal pipes can be the subject of theft. The two applicants Mahadeo Prasad and Beni Prasad are brothers and live in a house in cantonments which belongs to Mahadeo Prasad. They employed their younger brother Mangru, who was a pipe layer overseer in Military Works Service, to put a water connection from the main water pipe into their house. This was done contrary to law without the permission of, and indeed without the knowledge of, the cantonment authority and the Municipal Board. The tap being in the house no one has actually seen them taking water from it, but the Courts below were quite justified in infering that they had not gone to the trouble and expense of putting in this connection and their having it in their house for a month and a half without making use of it and taking water from it. Had they applied for permission to put in a tap in accordance with the rules they could have got permission but they would then have had to pay water rate which they were trying to escape paying by these surreptitious proceedings. They might have been convicted under the appropriate section of the Water Works Act or of the Municipalities Act or Cantonment Code, but the authorities, considering the offence as a serious one, preferred to charge them with theft of water under S. 379 I.P.C., and on this charge they have been convicted and sentenced to a fine of Rs. 300/- each. The convictions and the sentences have been upheld by the learned Sessions Judge in appeal.

It has been held both in England and in India that water when conveyed in pipes and so reduced into possession can be the subject of theft. The English case is that of Ferens v. O'Brien (1). There water was conveyed to a colliery by means of underground pipes and then supplied to the houses of the workmen by means of branch pipes to which taps were attached, the workmen being allowed to take water from taps on payment of a fixed price. The accused was seen taking water from one of the taps without having agreed to pay for it. It was held that under the circumstances he could be convicted of larceny at common law for taking this water.

In the Calcutta case of Emperor v. Sheikh Arif (2) it was held that water flowing in an open, though an artificial channel, could not be the subject of theft, and Ferens v. O'Brien (1) was distinguished on the ground that in the latter case the water was confined in pipes and thereby reduced into the possession of the water company which supplied it.

Chockalingam Pillai v. Emperor (3) was a case in which the water had been cut off from the natural source and conveyed through pipes, and thus reduced into effective possession. It was held both with reference to the English authority and to the definition of theft contained in S. 378 I. P. C. that it could be the subject of theft.

The present case is even stronger against the accused inasmuch as the water had not only been pumped, filtered and conveyed through pipes by the Municipal Board but was then, as I am informed at the hearing, sold by the Municipal Board to the

After considering the authorities I am of opinion that the water in this case was in the possession of the cantonment authority and that the accused's act in taking it comes within the definition of theft.

I have also been asked to interfere on the ground that the sentences were excessive, but in the judgment of the appellate Court it is expressly stated that no plea on the question of sentence was urged in that Court. The applicants are therefore not entitled to urge in revision that the sentences are too severe. I accordingly dismiss the applications of both accused.

Petition can be lodged only by a candidate in whose favour votes have been recorded and who claims in the petition to be declared elected in place of the person whose election is questioned, that is, a person who went through the contest, in whose favour votes were recorded and who alleges that by strict scrutiny of votes and striking off the names of people who should not have voted or by reason perhaps of disqualification of the person who has been elected he himself will be the person who will become the elected member in the event of the petition being enquired into and upheld. A petition under the Act need not be verified. [P. 133, C. 2 & P. 134 C. 1[

Mears, C. J.—The Municipal elections were held in Cawnpore in March, 1923. Suraj Narain was a candidate, as was also, one Muhammad Siddiq Hafiz. Both of these men were defeated by an opponent who secured a large number of votes. Both of these gentlemen thought they had a case for unseating their opponents and each of them proposed to proceed under the Municipalities Act, Local Act No. 11 of 1916 and lodged petitions. S 20 prescribes the form and the manner in which the petition shall be presented, and it also defines who are the persons who are permitted by law to present a petition. S. 22 defines who is to hear petitions and clause (2) of that section lays down how the proceedings may start by presentation.

Taking the case first of all of Suraj Narain, Miscellaneous Case No. 211 of 1923, the material dates and facts are as follows:- The election was held on March 20th, 1923, and on the 23rd of March Suraj Narain attended the Court of the Collector. The petition which he had with him was, as regards formal parts, in proper form; that is to say it was headed as being a matter which would be dealt with in the Court of the Commissioner (it was stated to be presented "through the Collector, Cawnpore District") and recited that it was a petition under S. 19 of the United Provinces Municipalities Act No. II of 1916. When Suraj Narain reached the Court the Collector had not arrived; but the Joint Magistrate was sitting and Joint Magistrate in answer to and enquiry by petitioner has recorded in a letter of April 7th, that a practice does exist in that Court, which undoubtedly is for the convenience of the public, whereby petitions intended for the Collector are received by the Joint Magistrate and made over to the Collector on his arrival. Suraj Narain relying upon that practice in fact handed to the Joint Magistrate the petition, and the Joint Magistrate in pursuance of that practice handed over to the Collector the document. That was done on the 23rd of March. So that Suraj Narain who had originally 15 days within which to deliver to the proper authorities a proper petition-in fact had got that petition into the hands of the proper authority, namely the Collector by the 23rd of March. It is suggested that we are bound to construe Ss. 20 and 22 so strictly as to hold that no presentation of a petition can avail the petitioner unless the petitioner himself personally comes face to face personally with the Collector and delivers it into the Collector's hands That undoubtedly is the safest and wisest thing to do. But the position as regards the Collector's Court at Cawnpore was that in reliance upon the practice Suraj Narain was content to follow that practice of handing documents intended for the Collector to the joint Magistrate. Inasmuch as the petition reached the Collector well within time, we are of opinion that it was a proper presentation and that petition ought to have been heard and disposed of upon the merits.

The next case with which we propose to deal is that of Muhammad Siddiq Hafiz, because there is some similarity in the facts. We will deal with the case of Durga Shanker later.

The elections for this particular ward in Cawnpore were held on the 19th of March, and that gave Muhammad Siddiq Hafiz up to the 3rd of April within which to be in time for the lodgement of his election petition. Fifteen days is specified by the Act, and the first broad question appears is, did he by any means whatever get into the hands of the Collector by 3rd of April the petition? The answer is that he did not do so, and that in our opinion makes a material difference in this case. On the 3rd of April, which was the last day, we are told that he presented the petition to a Deputy Collector by name Mr. Ashfaq Husain. There is not in the papers relating to this case any evidence which suggests that there was any practice whereby this Deputy Collector was authorised, or was accustomed short of actual authorization, to receive petitions of that nature and was a recognised official channel for their transmission to the Collector. That being so, we think that the petitioner in this case took the risk. If it happened that the Deputy Collector had forwarded the document to the Collector within time and the Collector had chosen to accept it from the Deputy Collector, that might possibly have been a good presentation. We do not say that it would have been a good presentation that matter would have to be enquired into with some care and might depend to some extent on whether we believed that there was in existence a recognised practice. However we are satisfied that in the absence of any evidence of that character, the petitioner when he handed the document to the Deputy Collector, who no doubt gave him an assurance that it would be forwarded to the Collector, took risk of its reaching the Collector within time. It did not reach the Collector within time and was not received by him until the 4th of April. In these circumstances we hold that as regards the petition of Muhammad Siddiq Hafiz that petition was not presented within time and is one which should not be entertained.

We now come to the petition of Durga Shanker. He like Muhammad Siddiq Hafiz handed the petition to a Deputy Collector, and again there is no evidence on this record that the Deputy Collector was a recognised channel for the transmission of these documents. We need not decide whether that petition was properly presented for this reason, that we are unable to understand how Durga Shanker comes before the Court as a petitioner. It appears that he was one of several candidates and that at a meeting it was considered desirable that there should not be so many candidates but that the choice of the two gentlemen who should contest the ward was left to the decision of a gentleman of high standing, who was regarded by the seven candidates as being likely to make the best selection. Two gentlemen were in fact selected. Durga Shanker was amongst the five whose names were pasessed over; and he having the belief that a candidate who was thus declared elected could be unseated on various grounds, conceives that he has a right to come forward and raise that question. These petitions can be lodged by a candidate in whose favour votes have been recorded and who claims in the petition to be declared elected in the room of the person whose election is questioned-that is a person who went through the contest, in whose favour votes were recorded and who alleges that strict scrutiny of votes and striking off the names of people who should not have voted or by reason perhaps of disqualification of the person who has been elected-that he himself will be the person who will become the elected member in the event of the petition being enquired into and upheld. That is the only one person who can present a petition; but body of men, ten or more electors, may join together and present a petition. Durga Sanker's position in this case has no locus standi in the matter of law, and on that ground was incompetent to present a petition and on that ground his petition must be rejected.

Mr. Stowell, the Commissioner, also enquires whether a petition must be duly verified in accordance with the rule applicable to plaints. We think not. When the petition has been duly presented the hearing follows along the lines prescribed for a Civil suit. The Act is silent as to the verification of the petition and it is only after due presentation of the petition that the civil suit procedure rules operate.

We are therefore of opinion that a petition need not be verified.

Order accordingly.

Civil Mis. No. 217 of 1923 Decided on 1st June 1923 from the Commissioner, Allahabad, D/- 27th April 1923.

U. P. Municipalities Act (II of 1916)—Bye-laws under Rule 36 (2)—Candidate can withdraw during polling.

Where for one seat there are two candidates and one of them withdraws during the progress of polling, an immediate declaration that the other candidate is duly elected is valid.

It is quite clear that just as a candidate can withdraw before the time for polling arrives, so he can withdraw during the polling, so also can he withdraw as soon as he is elected or he can withdraw at any time after the election. [P. 135 C. 1]

Gulzari Lal—for Applicants.

S. Raza Ali—for Opposite Party.

Mears, C. J.—This is a reference to the High Court under Order 46 of the Code of Civil Procedure read with S. 23 (c) of the Municipalities Act No. II of 1916. In Ward No. 4 of the Fatehgarh Municipal elections five candidates were nominated for the Moslem constituency. Three of them withdrew before the polling day. On that day two candidates were opposed to each other by name Omrao Khanand Abdul Hamid. There being only one seat the poll was duly opened and voters commenced to record their votes in favour of one or the other candidate. At some time whilst the polling was open and continuing Omrao Khan went to the Returning Officer and told him that he no longer desired to contest the seat. Thereupon the Returning Officer satisfied that that was the determination of Omrao Khan, closed the poll and declared that the one remaining candidate Abdul Hamid was duly elected to the one vacancy. It is suggested in the petition that the withdrawal of Omrao Khan was due to some political manouvering: but be that as it may we can only deal with what were the facts relating to the procedure. The fact was that the poll opened with two candidates for one vacancy, and before the time came for the poll to close and votes to be counted and the Returning Officer to declare who was elected there was only one candidate and that one candidate a candidate for the one vacancy. We think in the circumstances the Returning officer acted with propriety and common sense and that he acted quite reasonably. Rule 36 (1) of the Municipal Rules and By-laws of this particular Municipality, provide that a poll shall be taken on the day for the election when the number of duly nominated candidates who are entered in the schedule and who have not withdrawn their candidature before time fixed for the poll exceeds that of the vacancies. When you have got duly nominated candidates in excess of vacancies you have got to have an election. Rule 36 (2) provides: If the number of such candidates is equal to the number of vacancies, all such candidates shall be deemed to be elected. Therefore if there are three candidates and three vacancies, all such candidates shall be deemed to be elected: similarly two; similarly one. Now it is true that in terms Rule 36 (2) does not contemplate, nor is there anywhere any provision which contemplates the withdrawal of a candidate during the few hours during which the polling is in progress; but by analogy to the duties of the Returning Officer before the opening of the poll, we have no doubt that it was the proper course for the Returning Officer to act in conformity with rule 36 (2) and, finding only one candidate left for the one vacancy, to declare that man duly elected.

Dr. Sen voicing no doubt to some extent the suggestion thrown out by the Commissioner, said that the poll ought to remain open and in the end the Returning Officer should declare the remaining candidate duly elected. The difficulty about that is that if the poll remains open, votes are being recorded for a candidate who has withdrawn his candidature and is no longer one of the contestants. It is quite clear that just as a candidate can withdraw before the time for polling arrives, so he can withdraw during the polling, so also can he withdraw as soon as he is elected or can withdraw at any time after his election. A man does not bind himself that he will not withdraw either as a candidate or as a member of a Municipality. He is entitled to withdraw at any moment. In the circumstances we are of opinion that the Returning Officer acted in the circumstances legally and properly and rightly in accordance with his duties and dealt with the matter in proper way. We are of opinion that his declaration that Abdul Hamid was duly elected was a proper decision and in accordance with the law. This is our answer to the reference. The costs of this hearing including fees actually certified by counsel on both sides will be dealt with by the Commissioner in his discretion in disposing of the election petition.

Order accordingly.

Civ. Mis. Case No. 219 of 1923, Decided on 18th June, 1923, from the Commissioner of Allahabad D/-30th April. 1923.

U. P. Municipalities Act, S. 16 (3) (c)-"Place of profit" do not include ordinary commercial contract.

In the Municipal election held in March 1923 in Allahabad one M was a candidate, and was subsequently declared to have been duly elected. For some years he, with other members of his family, had held a contract for the supply of kerosene oil in bulk to the Municipal Board.

Held that on a fair construction of S. 16 (3) (c) the words "place of profit in the gift or disposal of the Municipal Board" do not cover any ordinary commercial contracts. The words "place of profit" in S. 16 (3) (c) denote position and employment in the sense of having a title attached to such employment and a definite standing and partaking of the nature and character of that of a master and servant. [P. 137 C. 2]

K. N. Katju—for Petitioners.

S. N. Sen, Harnandan Prasad and S. B. Johari—for Opposite Parties.

Mears, C. J.—At the Municipal election held in March last in Allahabad one Khan Bahadur Muhammad Abdul Baqi Khan was a candidate, and was subsequently declared to have been duly elected. For some years he, with other members of his family, had held a contract for the supply of kerosene oil in bulk to the Municipal Board. He was a member of the Board, whose term of office came recently to an end, and he had some three years ago disclosed the existence of that contract to the Commissioner and had been duly given permission to hold the same. He sat as a duly elected member throughout the period of the last Municipal Board. When he deemed himself to have been duly elected this year he again sought and obtained the permission of the Commissioner to carry out the contract, notwithstanding his membership of the Board. A petition to unseat him is now in course of hearing by the Commissioner; and amongst other grounds it is alleged that he was disqualified from becoming a candidate for election and that his election is consequently of no effect because he was at the time a person who under S. 16 (3) (c) held a "place of profit in the gift or disposal of the Municipal Board".

The Commissioner has referred this point to us for our determination. The argument put forward by the petitioners is that the words "place of profit" were deliberately chosen as a compendious, all embrasing phrase to cover every recognised ground of disqualification such as are to be found in the Indian Acts in pari materia. In support of that argument Dr. Katju has referred us to the Bombay Municipal Act (Act III of 1901) where amongst other provisions, disabilities attach to "a Municipal officer or servant, a licensed surveyer, or plumber, or one who has directly or indirectly by himself or through his partner any share or interest in any contract or employment with or under, or by, or on behalf of, the Municipality". S. 39 of the Calcutta Municipal Act has exactly similar disqualifying provisions. The Madras Municipal Act also affirms the inability of a person seeking election who has interest in any contract made with or work done for the corporation.

Therefore had this question, which we are called upon to decide, arisen in any election to which the Bombay, Calcutta or Madras Acts applied the position would be clear. The respondent would by the very words of either of these Acts have been disqualified for election. Here however we have to consider the words of the Local Municipal Act which are said to include the case of a man having a contract or interest in a contract with the Board. The question which we have to decide is whether it would be a fair construction of S. 16 (3) (c) to say that on a reasonable rendering of the words "place of profit in the gift or disposal of the Municipal Board" cover an ordinary commercial contract. The words "place of profit" have a definite historical association and when coupled with the word "office" are familiar to all students of constitutional history. The Act of settlement 12 and 13 William III Chapter II, S. 3 provides that upon the Accession of the House of Brunswick, no person holding any office or place of profit under the King should be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons. The phrase recurs in the Act of settlement of 4th Anne and in 6th Anne Chapter 41.

The object of these Acts was to insure that the members of the House of Commons should be as far as possible free from any possibility of influence, or under any likelihood of the exercise of authority by the monarch and should be free to give effect to their political opinions and should not be merely puppets. The office or place of profit to which these enactments apply vary from posts which were merely sinecures in the Royal House-hold to positions damanding arduous duties as great officers of State. An examination of them fails to disclose that they were in any way connected with commercial contracts into which, after all, a King as well as a commoner has to enter for the supply of commodities.

As far as we are aware there is only one case in which the term "office or place of profit" has been the subject of a judicial decision. In Astley v. New Tivoli Ltd. (1) the plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the defendant company and the other Directors from preventing him from acting as a Director of the Company. The defendants alleged that the plaintiff had ceased to be a Director because he had accepted from the Company the trusteeship of a covering deed relating to debentures on terms of payment by the company to him for his services. They insisted that these circumstances caused his Directorship to be determined inasmuch as one of the articles of Association prescribed that the office of a Director should be vacated if he held "any other office or place of profit under the company". Mr. Justice North decided that the position of trustee for the debenture holders was "a place of profit", the object of the articles of Association being to prevent the Directors from doing anything by which a Director continues to be a Director and yet accepted or held an additional office or place of profit under the company.

It will therefore be seen that the meanings which have been attached to the words "office or place of profit", do not lend any assistance to the petitioners, and they are thrown back upon their original general statement that the draughtsman meant by that phrase to include, and the Local Government by its acceptance meant to enact, that it should cover the special disabilities specifically set out in the Bombay, Calcutta and Madras Acts. We are unable to accept that argument. We find it, for instance, difficult to give any meaning to the words in S. 40 "continued to hold . . . any interest in a contract" or those in S. 82 "continues to have" . . . . . unless the Act contemplated the possibility of a candidate for election having in fact at the time an interest in a contract and being given by S. 40 an opportunity of obtaining permission from the Commissioner on his election to carry out the contract notwithstanding his election. A contractor who receives remuneration for the supply of articles cannot in accordance with the ordinary meaning of the word "place" be said to hold a place of profit. In Murray's Dictionary "place" is defined in this connection as 'office, employment, situation'. We are of opinion that the proper meaning which should be ascribed to the words "place of profit" in S. 16 (3) (c) is one which denotes position and employment in the sense of having a title attached to such employment and a definite standing and partaking of the nature and character of that of master and servant. That is, a position in relation to the Board in which the Board can require a person to obey its command and do certain work or render personal services in return for remuneration. Instances of this kind readily occur to one, e. g. a consulting Engineer who for a retaining fee holds himself at readiness to give expert opinions and furnish reports; a whole or part time medical officer with defined duties towards the Municipal Board; and each and every Municipal servant of any grade. This rule is necessary because members of a Board should not be in the false position of being masters and servants at one and the same time. We appreciate that the position of a contractor sitting on a Board may be a delicate one, and may give rise at times to difficult and embarassing situations but the question which we are called on to decide is whether on fair construction of the words "place of profit" a contractor could be included. We think not, and though it may have been the intention of the local legislature to follow along the lines of the disqualifications which had found favour in the enactments of Bombay, Calcutta and Madras, the fact according to our view is that they have failed to do so. That being so, we are of opinion that the holding of the kerosene contract by Khan Bahadur Muhammad Abdul Baqi Khan did not prevent his standing as a candidate and does not invalidate his election; and this is the answer we return to the Commissioner.

BANERJEE A.C.J. AND PIGGOTT, J.

Lalla Mal Hardeo Das Cotton Spinning Mill Co. of Hathras—In the matter of.

Mis. Case No. 223 of 1923, Decided on 2nd July, 1923, reference made by the Commissioner of Income-tax United Provinces, D/- 4th May, 1923.

The question whether there has been an advance of capital by particular partners, or a bona fide borrowing of money by the firm, in which the lender happens to be a partner must be treated as one of fact in each case. [P. 138 C. 2]

(b) Income Tax Act (1922), S. 2 (14)—Registered firm.

When a firm does not apply for registration as prescribed by statutory rules prior to the last day by which its return of income for the year was due, it can not be held to be a registered firm for the year in question by filing the application prior to the assessment.

The very latest date on which a return was due from the objectors under subsection (2) of S. 22 of the Indian Income-tax Act was the 5th of July, 1922. On this date there was not even in existence "an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners." The applicants presented their application to the Income-tax Officer on January, 2nd, 1923, who actually registered their firm by an order which purported to effect registration from January, 30th to March, 31st 1923.

Held: that the mere blunder of an Income-tax Officer could not make the objectors "registered firm" for the purposes of assessment during the financial year 1922–23, if they were not such within the meaning of the definition. [P. 139 C.1 P.140C.1 & P.141 C.2]

L. M. Banerjee—for the Crown.

S. N. Sen—for Applicants.

Piggott, J.—This is a reference by the Commissioner of Incometax under S. 66 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, No. XI of 1922. The assessees at whose instance the reference has been made are a firm carrying on business at Hathras, in the Aligarh District, under the style of the "Lalla Mal Hardeo Das Cotton Spinning Company": they may be conveniently referred to hereafter as "the objectors."

In the petition which led to the reference they sought to raise sundry questions of detail in respect of which no reference has been made. The Commissioner's action in this respect has been perfectly correct. The Commissioner is required to refer to the High Court any question of law arising out of any order made by him under S. 32 of the Act. The objectors are seeking to raise questions not referred to in their petition of appeal to the Commissioner; obviously no reference can be made to the High Court on any such question.

There remain two points set forth in the order of reference. One of these is of no great practical consequence and may be disposed of at once. The objectors were being assessed to income-tax for the financial year 1922—23 on the basis of the profits disclosed by their accounts for the calendar year 1921. In those accounts a total sum of Rs. 42,882/- was shown as interest paid on account of money advanced during the year by partners in the firm for the purpose of carrying on the business. The objectors claim that this interest should be treated as an "allowance" admissible under S. 10 (2) (iii) of the Indian Income-tax Act, and should therefore be deducted from the net profits of the year before these are assessed to Income-tax. The Assistant Commissioner, who examined the books of the firm reports that the money in respect of which this interest is charged in the accounts was not really borrowed for the purposes of the business, "but represented" only an advance of capital by the partners." This is so nearly a pure question of fact that it is not easy to formulate any question of law arising thereon in respect of which we can give an opinion. In the order of reference itself the question is stated thus:—

"Is the sum paid as interest to partners for capital put into a firm as allowance admisssble under section 10 (2) (iii)?" To the question as thus stated our answer is:—"No: such interest represents merely an assignment of a part of the net profits for the year in favour of partners who are regarded as entitled to such assignment by reason of special advances of capital made by them in the course of the year."

The question whether there has been an advance of capital by particular partners, or a bona fide borrowing of money by the firm, in which the lender happens to be a partner must be treated as one of fact in each case. We are not called upon to enter into questions of fact; but we feel bound to add that the facts laid before us in the course of arguments on both sides have not left us under the impression that the objectors have suffered injustice in this matter.

The other question raised by this order of reference is one of great importance to the objectors. They have been required to pay no less a sum than Rs. 81,641/9/- as super-tax on account of the year under assessment. They contend that they are not liable to supertax, because they were, during the financial year 1922-23, a "registered firm," within the meaning of that expression as defined in section 2 (14) of the Indian Income-tax Act. The commissioner, affirming the order of the Assistant Commissioner, has held that they were not; and the question has been referred to us in the following form :-

"Whether, when the firm did not apply for registration as prescribed by statutory rules prior to the last day by which its return of income for the year was due, it can be held to be a registered firm for the year in question by filing the application prior to the assessment."

Here again the question of law has been stated to us in a form which only admits of one answer, and that answer is negative. By definition, a "registered firm" is one "constituted under an "instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners of which the prescribed particulars have been registered with the Income-tax Officer in the prescribed manner." By clause (10) of the same S. 2, the word "prescribed" means "prescribed by rules made under this Act." It is not denied that certain rules have been made by competent authority and duly published so as to "have effect as if enacted in this Act" (vide section 59 (4) of the same) which "prescribe" the manner in which a firm entitled to do so can get itself "registered". Those rules have been laid before us. In Rule 2 it is laid down that the application to the Income-tax Officer must be made "on or before the date on which a return is due under sub-section (2) of S. 22 of the Indian Income-tax Act." In Rule 3 it is laid down that the application must be in a prescribed form and be accompanied by the original instrument of partnership under which the firm is constituted, together with a copy thereof. The Income-tax officer is empowered in special cases to dispense with the production of the original instrument, but a properly authenticated copy must always be produced.

Now, in the present instance, it is not denied that the very latest date on which a return was due from the objectors under sub-section (2) of S. 22 of the Indian Income-tax Act was the 5th of July 1922. On this date there was not even in existence an instrument of partnership specifying the individual shares of the partners" in the Lalla Mal Hardeo Das Cotton Spinning Company : such an instrument only came into existence on July 20th 1922. Not only therefore is it a fact that the objectors did not apply to the Income-tax Officer within the period limited by Rule, 2 but that period actually expired before they had put themselves in a position to make such an application by executing the "instrument of partnership " necessary to entitle them to do so. It follows inevitably that the objectors never brought themselves within the definition of a "registered firm" by getting the "prescribed particulars registered with the Income-tax Officer in the prescribed manner "

These considerations are sufficient to dispose of the reference ; but it is perhaps expedient that we should go into certain points a little further. In the course of an exceedingly able, and indeed exhaustive, statement of the case on behalf of his clients, Dr. Sen, who represented the objectors, raised two points which are not exactly covered by the remarks hitherto made.

First he contended that, even though his clients may not have presented their application to the Income-tax Officer within the prescribed period, that Officer had condoned the irregularity by accepting an application presented to him, in the first instance, on January 2nd, 1923, and once more presented after amendment on January 5th 1923 ; that the said officer did actually register their firm by an order which purports to effect registration from January 30th to March 31st 1923; that such registration, once effected, necessarily operates from the commencement of the financial year 1922-23; and that, in any event, the effect of this certificate is to entitle the objectors to immunity from the super-tax for two months of the financial year.

Secondly, Dr. Sen represented, in various forms and in connection with different parts of his argument, the contention that his clients were entitled to a generous interpretation in their favour of a fiscal enactment; that they were the victims of chicanery on the part of the officials of the income-tax department and, generally, that the equities of the case were entirely in their favour.

To the first point it would be almost a sufficient answer to say that the mere blunder of an Income-tax Officer could not make the objectors a "registered firm" for the purposes of assessment during the financial year 1922-23, if they were not such within the meaning of the definition. Indeed, the exigencies of Dr. Sen's argument brought him perilously near the position that a formal certificate of registration, dishonestly or corruptly issued by an Income-tax officer in flat defiance of the rules, would bind the Income-tax authorities and carry with it a right of exemption from super-tax. In the present instance, of course, there is no suggestion of intentional misconduct on the part of the Income-tax Officer. Indeed it is obvious that he did not himself regard the certificate granted by him as of any effect prior to the 30th of January 1923. Nor could it have any such effect, supposing it to be otherwise valid; for in Rule 5 of the rules on the subject it is expressly laid down that such a certificate of registration "shall have effect from the date of registration". Obviously this certificate was never intended to affect the liability of the objectors to payment of super-tax which was being levied in respect of the earnings of their firm during the calendar year 1921. That liability could not be split up so as to be enforced for part only of the financial year 1922-23; the objectors had finally lost their right to the privileges of a registered firm" for that year, when the 5th of July 1922 went by without their even having executed an instrument of partnership. The certificate issued by the Income tax Officer on January 30th 1923 may have been intended to save the objectors' trouble by enabling them, during the next financial year, to apply for a renewal of the certificate, instead of having to take out a new one: it could have no other possible effect.

We can make these matters even clearer by dealing briefly with Dr. Sen's next point.

On April 5th, 1922 the objectors were served with a formal notice calling on them to put in a return of their income for the calendar year 1921, and giving them a month in which to do so.

On may 4th. 1922 the objectors obtained a month's extension of time.

On June 3rd. 1922 they put in two applications. One of these asked for another month's time in which to prepare and submit the return of income: it was on this application that they were given time till the 5th of July 1922. The other was an intimation that the firm intended to apply for registration; but it contained an admission that no instrument of partnership had yet been executed, and asked for information on points of procedure, which information was duly furnished.

The 5th of July 1922 passed without any return having been furnished; and on July 17th, 1922 the Assistant Commissioner wrote to the firm and told them plainly that their chance of obtaining registration was over for that year.

On July 20th, 1922 the objectors at last got their instrument of partnership executed; but at the time they seemed inclined to accept the intimation that it was now too late to be of any use for that year.

On October 27th, 1922 the objectors were at last compelled to submit their books for examination; and on December 22nd, 1922 the Income-tax Officer was able to report the result of his examination. The Assistant Commissioner, whose duty it was to make the assessment, by reason of a general order lawfully issued under S. 5 (4) of the Indian Income-tax Act, completed his work on January 26th, 1923. One would have assumed that the same general order would have transferred to the Assistant Commissioner from the Income-tax Officer the duty of dealing with any application for registration which the firm might make. We do not know whether this was the case or not; the point is one which the Commissioner might do well to note, so that no such complication may again arise as was permitted in this case. It appears that, while the question of their assessment was before the Assistant Commissioner, the objectors went, behind his back, to the Income-tax officer with an application for registration, first presented on January 2nd, 1923, and again on January 5th, 1923, after the instrument of partnership had been returned for certain amendments. It was on this application that the Income-tax Officer's certificate of registration was obtained on January 30th, 1923. The Assistant Commissioner was in, complete ignorance of these proceedings when he made his assessment on January 26th, 1923. On that date the objectors were beyond all question an "unregistered firm" and were very properly assessed as such.

From this statement of the facts it is clear that the objectors were to blame for not making any return of their income, and also for the delay in the production of their books of account. There are no merits whatever in their case. They had lost their right to be dealt with as a "registered firm" for the financial year 1922-23, for the simple reason that they had failed even to provide themselves with an instrument of partnership within the extended period allowed them for the presentation of their return of income. The obvious intention of the rules, as shown by the wording of the prescribed form of certificate, is that such applications should ordinarily be presented in the month of April, the first month of the financial year. Where, as in the present case, the period for making a return of income has been extended, there can be no objection to a certificate being issued bearing the correct date of some other month. It will take effect from the date specified therein. When the assessment comes to be made, the officer charged with that duty will have to determine simply whether the firm with whose return, or with whose accounts, he is dealing, is or is not a "registered firm" within the meaning of the definition. The objectors had been plainly told that they would be dealt with for the year 1922-23 as an "unregistered firm": their attempt to escape from this position by going to the income tax officer at the beginning of January 1923 was wholly futile. It is they who are attempting to evade a just liability by raising technical pleas and pressing for a strained, and indeed impossible, interpretation of one or two details in the rules.

Our answer therefore to the principal question referred to us is, as we have already intimated, in the negative.

Under clause (6) of S. 66 of the Indian Income-tax Act (No. XI of 1922) we order the assessees to bear the costs of this reference, including the fee certified by the Government Advocate, who has appeared to support the assessment.

Criminal Ref. No. 230 of 1923, Decided on 26th April 1923 form the S. J., Allahabad, D/-12th April 1923.

Cr. P. Code S. 106—Order under this section should be passed by the same Magistrate who tried the accused for the principal offence and not by another Magistrate.

[P. 142, C. 1]

Daniels, J:—This case has been referred by the learned Sessions Judge at Allahabad on the ground that an order under S. 106 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was passed without jurisdiction. A case under Ss. 352 and 506 of the Indian Penal Code was before a Magistrate of the second class. Being of opinion that the accused should be bound over under S. 106 of the Code of Criminal Procedure he referred the case to the joint Magistrate. The Joint Magistrate passed an order under S. 106 but did not deal with the substantive charge and on his sending the record back the accused were convicted by the second class Magistrate in whose Court the case originally was. Under these circumstances the learned Sessions Judge is right in saying that the Joint Magistrate acted without jurisdiction. The learned Sessions Judge appears to be of opinion that the order was a proper order on the merits but he has not thought it necessary to ask this Court to restore the order in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction under S. 106 (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I accept the reference and set aside the order passed under S. 106.

Criminal P. C., S. 110—Evidence insufficient.

Evidence showing that the applicant took part in a dacoity, that he was actually arrested in connection with the decoity but the police considered the evidence against him of so little value that he was released under S. 169 of Cr. The Asstt Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Daniels, J.—This is an application by Jhandu Singh who has been bound over under S. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment on the failure to give security. An appeal was filed to the District Magistrate who in a very brief judgment dismissed the appeal. The learned District Magistrate says that the he has read the evidence, that the Magistrate has written a fair and convincingjudgment and that he fails to see how the trying Magistrate could have come to any other conclusion with regard to the guilt of the appellant. I regret to say that the judgment of the trying Magistrate produces an entirely opposite impression on me from that which it has produced on the learned District Magistrate. The applicant was admittedly at enmity with the Mukhia Nawab Singh and was a witness for the prosecution in a case in which the Mukhia was accused of murder. The applicant was tried with eight other persons as forming one gang. The Magistrate expressly finds that the evidence that they did form one gang is unworthy of credit. He has also acquitted several of the accused on the ground that they were implicated through enmity. His chief reason for convicting the applicant is that he believes that certain evidence goes to show that the applicant took part in a dacoity which was committed in December 1922 shortly after the murder case. Now the applicant was actually arrested in connection with the dacoity in question, but the police considered the evidence against him of so little value that he was released under S. 169 of the Criminal Procedure Code without even being placed before the Court. It is contrary to all accepted principles to make use of this evidence as a ground for binding the accused over on a charge of being a bad character. If the evidence was insufficient to implicate the accused in the offence to which it relates it was equally insufficient to be used for influencing the Court against him on a question of his general character. It was equally not open to the Magistrate to act on information not given in evidence but obtained from a perusal of the special diary. Although the Magistrate says at the conclusion of his judgment that there is some evidence against the accused and the other persons who have been convicted of cutting crops it is clear from the judgment that the main grounds on which he has convicted the accused are the evidence tendered to show that he took part in the dacoity case and a perusal of the special diary. The order of the Court below cannot therefore be upheld. I allow the application and setting aside the order passed against the accused direct his immediate release.

Application allowed.

Criminal Ref. No. 330 of 1923 Decided on 6th June 1923, from the S. J, Moradabad, D/-23rd April 1923.

Workman's Breach of Contract Act (13 of 1859 amended by 12 of 1920), S. 4—New contract in place of old one—No cash advance for the second time—Contract is valid.

Accused obtained an advance of Rs. 300 for doing certain work. He worked for a few months after the execution of the agreement but failed to complete the engagement. He was arrested and on being charged with a breach of contract executed another agreement in lieu of the former advance to work for another period of one year. Thereupon the complaint originally filed against him was withdrawn After the execution of the second agreement he worked again for a little while and then broke off the engagement. The complainant thereupon proceeded against him to enforce his agreement and obtained an order.

Held that the order was right ; Although no advance in cash was made at the time of the second agreement the new contract entered into under the circumstances above mentioned merely superseded the old contract, and its validity is recognised by S. 4 of the Act.

Kanhaiya, Lal, J.—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of Moradabad in a case in which the accused Abdul Rashid Khan has been directed to pay Rs. 300/- to the complainant Haji Nisar Muhammad Khan by certain instalments under S. 2 of Act 13 of 1859 as amended by Act 12 of 1920. It appears that in 1920 Abdul Rashid Khan obtained an advance of Rs 300/- for doing a certain wark. He worked for a few months after the execution of the agreement but failed to complete the engagement. He was arrested and on being charged with a breach of the contract executed another agreement in lieu of the former advance to work for another period of one year. Thereupon the complaint originally filed against him was withdrawn. After the execution of the second agreement he worked again for a little while and then broke off the engagement. The complainant thereupon proceeded against him again to enforce his agreement and obtained an order, the correctness of which forms the subject of this reference. The view taken by the learned Sessions Judge is that inasmuch as no advance in cash was made at the time of the second agreement, S. 2 of Act 13 of 1859 as amended by Act 12 of 1920 was inapplicable. But the advance may be an advance made at that time for the performance of the engagement or at some time earlier. The new contract entered into under the circumstances above mentioned merely superseded the old contract, and its validity is recognised by S. 4 of the Act, which provides that the word "contract" as used therein would include all contracts falling within the meaning of the Indian Contract Act of 1872 except where the period specified for performance exceeds one year. The new contract provided for the performance of the engagement for one year only and was valid and enforceable. The order of the trying Magistrate need not therefore be disturbed.

A. Sanyal—for Appellant.

P. L. Banerjee—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The appellant before us was the judgment debtor, and on an application being made to execute the decree against him he objected that the application was time-barred. The trial Court dismissed the objection. The objector appealed and on the date fixed for the hearing of the appeal failed to put in an appearance, and he was not represented by Counsel. The learned District Judge recorded the following order :—

"Counsel for the appellant is absent. Appellant is himself absent. His brother or a person alleging himself to be his brother, applies for an adjournment. I see no good reason to grant this. There does not seem to me to be the least force in this appeal; the reasons given by the Subordinate Judge holding that the application of the decree-holder respondent for execution was in time and not time-barred are good and sound. I dismiss this appeal with costs on the merits."

The appellant comes here in second appeal and urges that under Order 41 Rule 17 the learned District Judge should not have dismissed the appeal on the merits but should either have allowed an adjournment or should have dismissed it for default. This point was considered recently in the Madras High Court, in Mahammad v. Manavikrama (1) and we entirely agree with that decision.

A preliminary objection is taken that no appeal lies on the ground that on the appellant's own showing the Court below had no jurisdiction to pass the order which it did pass. The form which the argument takes is this. The only order which the Court below had jurisdiction to pass was an order dismissing the appeal for default. The order under appeal must therefore be treated as an order dismissing the appeal for default, since this is the only order the Court below could legally pass. From such an order no appeal lies.

The argument is ingenious but unsound. The right of appeal does not depend on what the Court ought to have done but on what it actually did What it actually did was to pass a decree on the merits. Against such a decree the law allows an appeal. When the appeal comes up for decision the appellate Court has then to decide whether the order passed was a proper order and one which the Court below had jurisdiction to pass. If it decides this question in the negative it will set the order aside. The respondents reasoning would deprive the aggrieved party of the right of appeal just in those cases in which it is most needed. The respondent relies in support of his argument on two old cases Kanahi Lal v. Nanhat Rai (2) and Krishna Ram v. Govind Prasad (3). These were decisions under the old Act the language of which is different from that of the present Code, but if there is anything in these cases to support the position taken up by the respondent we are unable to follow them. The result is that we allow the appeal. The question involved is one of law and we should have been prepard to dispose of it ourselves, but all the documents which have been relied on by the Court of first instance are not before us. We therefore allow the appeal and pass the order which we think the Court below should have passed, that is, to dismiss the appeal to the Court below for default. If the appellant wishes to restore the appeal, he must apply to the Court below and satisfy that Court that the appeal should be restored.

We make no order as to costs.

Criminal App. No. 409 of 1923 Decided on 30th June 1923, from the order of the S. J., Mainpuri, D/- 9th April, 1923.

Penal Code, Ss. 302 & 34—Beating by five persons Death the common result—All are guilty.

One B an elderly Kachhi was mercilessly beaten by the four accused. There had been litigation between B on the one side and two of the accused, on the other, in which B had been entirely successful, B was taken to the hospital where he died two days afterwards. All the accused had joined in beating B when he was on the ground with lathis and they inflicted such serious injury to him that he died two days afterwards.

Held: that they must have known that at the least they were causing injury which was likely to cause death, and if death resulted they are guilty of murder. In such cases it is immaterial by whose lathi the fatal injury is inflicted. 29 All. 283 is no longer good law. 1923 All. 88 Ref. . [P 145 C 2, P 146 C 1]

The Asstt. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Ryves, J.—Niranjan, Banwari, Ranjit and Ummed were committed to the Court of Sessions at Mainpuri on charges under Ss. 148 and 302 I. P, C. The learned Sessions Judge convicted Ummed under Ss. 148 and 304 I. P. C. and convicted the remainder under Ss. 148 and 325. He sentenced Ummed to transportation for life under S. 304 and the other three, to five years rigorous imprisonment under S. 325. Ummed appealed to this Court. On his appeal being admitted by a learned Judge of this Court notice was sent to Niranjan, Banwari and Ranjit to show cause why the conviction should not be altered in their case and the sentence enhanced accordingly Niranjan has since died in jail. The notice has been served on Banwari and Ranjit and no cause is shown on their behalf. We therefore take up the case of Ummed on appeal and the cases of Ranjit and Banwari in revision.

It is proved by the clearest evidence that Bhopal an elderly Kachhi of Narayanpur was mercilessly beaten by the four accused and one Gannu who is absconding. There had been litigation between Bhopal on the one side and Niranjan and Banwari, who are brothers, on the other in which Bhopal had been entirely successful with the result that there was the bitterest enmity against him on the part of Niranjan and Banwari. Only very shortly before this occurrence Bhopal had obtained a decree under S. 9. of the Specific Relief Act against them and was then putting his decree into execution. Bhopal was taken to the Hospital at Mainpuri where he died on the 13th January. The medical evidence shows that he was most mercilessly beaten and his skull was fractured and eleven ribs were broken.

The evidence against the accused is overwhelming. It consits of several eye-witnesses who saw the assualt in broad day-light and who knew all the accused. In the first report which was made on information given by Bhopal himself, all five are named. The learned Sessions Judge has come to the conclusion that on the evidence the apparent intention of the accused was to cripple Bhopal and not to kill him. He gathers this from the statements of the witnesses who say that the accused were saying as they were beating Bhopal that they would not leave him in a condition to fight a case in Mainpuri. We should have drawn a very different inference from these remarks, but it seems to us quite unnecessary to do so. There is no doubt that all the five accused joined in beating Bhopal when he was on the ground with lathis and they inflicted such serious injury to him that he died two days afterwards. They must have known that at the least they were causing injury which was likely to cause death, and if death resulted they are all guilty of murder. In such cases it is immaterial by whose lathi the fatal injury is inflicted. The learned Judge has drawn a distinction between Ummed and the other three accused before him, a distinction which we are entirely unable to appreciate. It may be that Ummed inflicted the first blow or even the blow on the head but that does not distinguish his case from that of the others. They all joined in the attack and the death was the result of the beating inflicted by them all jointly. The learned Sessions Judge has relied on the case of Emperor v. Bhola Singh (1). That case has not been followed in several later decisions and can no longer be treated as good law: Vide Emperor v. Ram Nevaz (2) and Emperor v. Hanumam (3) Emperor v. Gulab (4). In this case the decision of a single Judge in Emperor v. Chandan Singh (5) which followed 29 All. 282, was expressly overruled. A similar decision reported in Dhian Singh v. King Emperor (6), was dissented from in 35 All. 560. The latest decision on the point is that of Sipahi Singh v. Emperor (7). In our opinion all the accused ought to have been convicted of murder, and if they had been so convicted and sentenced to death we should not have interfered. As it is we alter the conviction in the case of Ummed from S. 304 to S. 302 and in the case of Banwari and Ranjit from S. 325 to S. 302. We maintain the sentence of Ummed of transportation for life and enhance that of Banwari and Ranjit to transportation for life with effect from the 9th of April 1923. The sentence under S. 148 will remain and run concurrently.

Appeal dismissed.

A. P. Pandey—for Appellants.

Judgment—This is a defedants' appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit. On appeal the learned District Judge has decreed it

The plaintiffs in order to prove the custom alleged relied on an entry in the wajibularz of 1882 which prima facie raised a presumption of the existence of the custom. To rebut this evidence the defendants proved the fact that in the year 1840 there was a single proprietor in this mahal and further that no suit for pre-emption had ever been brought between the years 1840 and 1882. The learned District Judge has considered all the circumstances in the case and has weighed the evidence. In our opinion the circumstance of there being a single proprietor in 1840 does not necessarily rebut the presumption of custom raised by the entry in the wajibularz of 1882; as the learned Judge has pointed out, it was admitted in the written statement that there had been numerous transfers it was possible that a custom might have grown up during that interval. In second appeal we find it impossible to hold that the learned Judge was wrong in holding that the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs had not been sufficiently rebutted.

The learned vakil for the appellants relied on the case of Kulsumunnissa Bibi v. Khasalat Husain (1). We may point out that in that case stress was laid on the circumstance that the learned Judge of the Court below was under a misapprehension on a question of law, namely that the fact that the property once was in the hands of a single proprieter did not put an end to the custom. It was in view of that erroneous assumption that the Bench said that in the peculiar circumstances of that case a question of law did arise and they were justified in going behind the findings of fact.

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed under Order 41 rule 11.

S. A. No. 896 of 1923, Decided on 20th June, 1923, against the decree of the Small Causes Court, exercising the powers of Sub. J., Allahabad, D/-10th March, 1923.

T. P. Act, S. 91—A person in joint cultivation of occupancy holdnig can redeem.

In the case of an occupancy holding if one parcel is mortgaged and another parcel is free from the mortgage, and a person is joint in cultivation with the mortgagor in the latter, that is enough to give him a right to redeem the former. [P. 147, C. 1

Damodar Das—for Appellants.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for the redemption of a mortgage said to have been effected by Diplu Singh, the ancestor of the plaintiffs in favour of Thakur Dayal, the ancestor of the defendants. The defendants denied the existence of the alleged mortgage; but the Court below found that the mortgage in question was proved. The defendants also denied that the plaintiffs were the lawful successors of Diplu Singh; but the Courts below found against them. It appears that Diplu Singh was an occupancy tenant of the plots in dispute and that he mortgaged them with Thakur Dayal and gave him possession. The plaintiffs were his collateral descendants and were according to the Courts below joint in cultivation with him in the holding. The extent of that holding is not mentioned. Whether they were joint with him in the cultivation of the whole holding mortgaged or in the cultivation of the remainder of his holding, makes no difference, because a holding is defined as a parcel or parcels of land held under one tenure or lease or engagement. If one parcel is mortgaged and another parcel is free from the mortgage, and a person is joint in cultivation with the mortgagor in the latter, that is enough to give him a right to redeem the former. If he is joint in cultivation with him in the holding, that is to say in any parcel of land comprised in that holding, the entire holding can devolve on him, for it must devolve as a whole under S. 22 of the U. P. Tenancy Act (No. II of 1901). If the holding comprised only the mortgaged plots, the fact that the plaintiffs were in joint cultivation with the mortgagor before the mortgage would equally give them a right to redeem the mortgage. An occupancy tenant may hold a part of the land comprised in the holding in his cultivation jointly with his kinsmen and may sub-let the rest thereof but the effect of such a sub-lease cannot prevent the devolution of the entire holding on the kinsmen, who are joint in the cultivation with him of the remainder. The fact that he has made a mortgage of a portion would similarly make no difference. In either event the jointness in the cultivation is determined by the fact of cultivation itself and not by its extent.

It is asserted that the statements of some of the witnesses relied on were misunderstood by the Courts below in arriving at the conclusion recorded by those Courts, but there is nothing to show that that contention is well-founded. The appeal is therefore rejected.

Appeal dismissed.

S. A. No. 905 of 1923, Decided on 22nd June, 1923, against the decree of the Dt. J., Saharanpur, D/-23rd February, 1923.

Registration Act, S. 32—General power to execute document includes power to present for registration.

Where a person holds a power of attorney to execute a document on behalf of his principal and the document has been executed by him as such he is, so far as the Registration Office is concerned, the actual executant of the document and is entitled under S. 32 (a) to present it for registration and to get it registered. He need not possess a separate power authenticated as under S. 33. [P. 148, C. 2.]

Mushtaq Ahmad—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The point raised in this appeal is a point of law under Ss. 32 and 33 of the Registration Act, but as the question appears to me to be quite free from doubt on the language of the Act, I propose to dispose of the appeal at once. The document, the presentation of which is challenged, was executed by Raghunath Das the general agent of Ram Lal and of the widow of Ganpat Rai on their behalf. The power of attorney which he held authorised him to execute documents on their behalf and he executed the document under the terms of this power of attorney. He then presented it for registration at the Registration Office and it was registered. The plea taken by the appellant in this Court and in the Courts below was that in order to enable him to present the document it was necessary that he should hold a power of attorney authenticated before the Sub-Registrar under the provisions of S. 33. A reference to S. 32 shows that a document may be presented for registration either under Cl. (a) by a person actually executing it or by some one claiming under it, or it may be presented under Cl. (c) by the agent of such person duly authorised by a power of attorney executed and authenticated in accordance with S. 33. The provisions of S. 33 therefore clearly apply where the person presenting a document is the general attorney of the person executing it, and not where it is presented for registration by the actual executant, even though he may have executed it as agent for some one else. The person actually executing a document is entitled to present it for registration under Cl. (a) of S. 32 without the necessity of any power of attorney. No doubt an agent requires a power of attorney to empower him to execute a document on behalf of his principal, but when once the document has been executed he is, so far as the Regiatration Office is concerned, the actual executant of the document and is entitled under S. 32 (a) to present it for registration and to get it registered. The appellants suggest that the case is altered by the fact that the power of attorney which Raghunath Das held gave him two authorities, first an authority to execute documents on behalf of his principal, and second an authority empowering him to present documents for registration on behalf of his principal. This in my opinion does not affect the case as in this case he acted under the first of the two powers. The learned Judge of the Court below has in my opinion properly appreciated and dealt with the point of law involved, and as his decision is in my opinion clearly right I dismiss the appeal under order 41 rule 11.

(a) Hindu Law—Alienation by Widow—Legal necessity—Arrears of revenue is necessity.

The existence of arrears of revenue for which the estate is liable to be sold up is at least presumptive evidence of necessity, even though when the loan is incurred, the Government may not have taken measures to enforce the liability. This presumed necessity may no doubt be repudiated by showing that the widow had sufficient income to enable her to pay the revenue without the necessity of borrowing. [P. 149, C. 2.]

Judgment.—The issue in this case is whether the mortgages executed in 1907 and 1908 by a Hindu widow Mussammat Kailasha were executed for legal necessity

The suit out of which the appeal arises was brought by the mortgagees for sale of the mortgaged property. The defendants appellants are the reversioners of Musammat Kailasha's husband Radha Kishan. There are some parts of the judgment of the lower Appellate Court which are not very clear, but there is no doubt as to what its findings are. It finds that the consideration for these mortgages was actually advanced for payment of revenue, and it is not disputed that it was applied in payment of revenue. The appellants contend that there was no legal necessity, first because it was not shown that the estate was actually threatened with sale when the mortgages were executed and secondly because Mt. Kailasha received from the estate an income sufficient to enable her to pay the revenue. As to the latter point the learned Judge finds that she had an income which would ordinarily be sufficient to enable her to pay revenue, but at the time when these mortgages were executed, she had been obliged to incur unusual expenditure by reason of a litigation in which she had been involved for the protection of the estate. The learned Judge therefore finds that there was at the time a pressure on the estate. He also finds, though he has not attached to the circumstance the weight to which we think it is justly entitled, that the reversioners themselves paid off, as if it were a valid debt, another mortgage executed by Mt. Kailasha for payment of revenue, shortly after the mortgages in suit. These mortgages were actually recited in that deed. On these findings the question of legal necessity cannot be seriously disputed. The existence of arrears of revenue for which the estate is liable to be sold up is at least presumptive evidence of necessity, even though, when the loan is incurred, the government may not have taken measures to enforce the liability. This presumed necessity may no doubt be repudiated by showing that the widow had sufficient income to enable her to pay the revenue without the necessity of borrowing. The learned Judge in this case, though he finds that she had a substantial income, has also found that there were special circumstances which made it necessary for her to borrow money at this particular time.

Three other points have been urged by the appellants. The first is that the interest under the deed was excessive. This point is nowhere specifically raised in the grounds of appeal, though the memorandum of appeal is divided into seven paragraphs, and we do not think that the appellants are entitled to urge it. Nor do we think that 15 per cent. interest with yearly rests is an extraordinarily high rate. The second point is that instead of passing a mortgage decree in the usual form the Court below has given a personal decree against the reversioners. This is no doubt due to an oversight on the part of the office in drawing up the decree. The learned Judge merely says in his judgment that he allows the appeal and decrees the sum claimed. Reference to the plaint shows clearly that the claim was for a decree for the amount claimed by sale of the mortgaged property. This plea is therefore allowed and the decree will be amended and the decree in the form of order 34 rule 4 will be prepared. Accounts will be prepared up to a date six months from now. Interest will run at the contractual rate up to that date, and thereafter simple interest will be allowed at 6 per cent. per annum till payment. We notice that the decree of the Court below was signed by the appellant's learned pleader who is therefore responsible for not pointing out the oversight.

The last point was that the second mortgage was not proved, and this point is taken in para 7 of the grounds of appeal, but it does not appear to have been pressed in the Court below. In any case we are satisfied that there is no substance in it. There were three attesting witnesses to the deed. Two of them were dead and the third denied attestation. A witness has proved execution under S. 71 of the Evidence Act. The appellant's argument was that he should also have proved execution in the presence of the attesting witnesses. S. 71 does not require this and there is authority both of this Court in Narain Das v. Dilwar (1) and that of the Patna High Court in Lakshman Sahu v. Gokul Maharana (2) that proof of execution is sufficient.

Except to the extent stated above we dismiss the appeal. As the appellant has substantially failed the respondents will get their costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Judgment.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for recovery of possession of considerable property, together with mesne profits, against several sets of defendants. The plaintiff's case was that one Maheshwar Dayal, son of Sri Kishen Das, was the last male owner of the property and died in the year 1895. On his death he was succeeded by his mother Musammat Gomti Kunwar, who died in 1903; and on her death his grandmother Musammat Darab Kunwar remained in possession till 1906 when she also died. On the death of this second limited owner the plaintiff claimed to succeed as Maheshwar Dayal's nearest collateral, alleging that he was connected with him through Jwala Datt, who was Harsukh Rai's daughter's son and was alleged to be his adopted son also.

The suit was instituted just within 12 years of the death of Musammat Darab Kunwar. In the plaint there was no express mention as to when the alleged adoption of Jwala Datt took place, nor was it stated whether he had been adopted by Harsukh Rai himself or by his widows after his death, and in the latter case, whether the widow had any authority to adopt. The plaintiff contented himself by simply stating that he was the heir of Maheshwar Dayal according to the genealogical table given in the plaint. By subsequent oral pleadings the plaintiff asserted that Jwala Datt had been adopted after the death of Harsukh Rai by his widows with his authority, and that there was a custom among Vaish Agarwals to adopt a daughter's son.

Separate written statements were filed on behalf of various defendants. Musammat Makundi Kunwar and Musammat Lachchi Kunwar, defendants Nos. 1 and 2, pleaded that Nihal Chand and Sri Kishen Das had been joint, and that Jwala Datt had never been adopted by Harsukh Rai's widows nor had the widows any authority to adopt him, nor could an adoption of a daughter's son be valid. They further set up the adoption of Jai Bhagwan Sarup, defendant No. 3, thereby denying that the plaintiff was the nearest collateral. Jai Bhagwan Sarup, defendant No. 3, asserted that Musammat Lachchi Kunwar, the widow of Bisheshwar Dayal, had adopted him and thus he became the nearest heir of Sri Kishen Das or Maheshwar Dayal and would in any case exclude the plaintiff. He also pleaded that the plaintiff was estopped from denying his adoption and urged that the claim was barred by time. Lala Fateh Chand, defendant No. 4, filed a separate written statement in which he admitted generally the pedigree given in the plaint, with the exception of the existence of Maheshwar Dayal. He pleaded, inter alia, that no son qualified to inherit was ever born to Sri Kishen Das, and set up a will of Sri Kishen Das in favour of Musammat Gomti Kunwar and a subsequent will of Musammat Gomti Kunwar in his own favour. By a subsequent oral pleading he denied the validity of the adoption and the existence of the alleged custom. Defendants Nos. 5 to 7 in addition set up their claim as bona fide purchasers for value from ostensible owners.

Twenty-eight issues were framed in the Court below out of which all the issues except issues Nos. 3, 4, 8, 26 and 27, have been found in favour of the plaintiff. The grounds on which the plaintiff's claim has been dismissed are that the factum of the adoption of Jwala Datt has not been established, nor has it been proved that Harsukh Rai's widows had the authority to adopt The plaintiff's contention that an award of the year 1873 either operated as res judicata or concluded the matter as a family arrangement has been overruled.

The learned advocate for the plaintiff has challenged the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge on the issues decided against his client.

[The judgment then dealt with evidence and continued as follows.]

Having considered the entire evidence, both oral and documentary, we are of opinion that the balance of evidence is distinctly in favour of the defendants and we think that the learned Subordinate Judge has come to the right conclusion in holding that the plaintiff has failed to establish that Jwala Datt had been adopted by the widows of Harsukh Rai.

In view of this finding it becomes unnecessary for us to go into the question of the authority to adopt or any other of the questions raised in the Court below.

There, however, remains for us to consider the argument of the learned advocate for the plaintiff that in view of the admissions contained in Lala Fateh Chand's pleadings the plaintiff is entitled to a decree against him in respect of the properties in his possession. We have already pointed out that the plaint itself was very defective inasmuch as it did not make any express allegation that Jwala Datt had been adopted by the widows of Harsukh Rai or that his widows had any authority to adopt. The fact of adoption was mentioned only in the genealogical tree given in the plaint. The defendant Lala Fateh Chand generally admitted the correctness of the pedigree, with one exception. When the time for the oral pleadings came, the plaintiff's vakil stated that Jwala Datt had been adopted by the widows of Harsukh Rai after his death and that there was a custom among Vaish Agarwals under which the adoption of a daughter's son was valid. Lala Fateh Chand's vakil although admitting the factum of adoption, denied the validity of it basing its invalidity, on the Hindu law. The other defendants to the suit had expressly denied the adoption of Jwala Datt The plaintiff took upon himself the burden of proving the alleged adoption and led evidence to that effect without any reservation. After both parties had given evidence and the Court had come to the conclusion that the plaintiff had failed to prove the case set up by him, it would not lie in the mouth of the plaintiff to turn round and ask for a decree against one of the defendants who had not expressly denied one of the facts in issue, though he had denied the validity of the adoption and the maintainability of the claim of the plaintiff altogether. If such a request were allowed, the result would be that in the same suit the Court would have to record one finding in favour of the plaintiff based on the admission of one of the defendants to the suit, and another finding on the same issue against him based on the evidence. In an analogous case, namely that of Janki Das v. Ahmad Husain Khan (1) this Court remarked that it would be illogical to hold in one and the same decree that the full amount of consideration in a mortgage was paid as far as the mortgagor was concerned and that another sum was paid as far as the subsequent transferee was concerned, and that the proper thing to do would be to allow all the defendants to take advantage of the plaintiff's failure to establish the the case set up by him. In addition to this we would like to point out that Order 8, rule 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which regards allegations of fact in the plaint, if not denied specifically or by necessary implication, or stated to be not admitted, as taken to be admitted, gives a discretion to the Court to require any facts so admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admission. We think that in the present case, in view of the ambiguous assertion made in the plaint and the unsatisfactory way in which the pedigree was admitted and the validity of adoption denied by one of the defendants, the court below was justified in calling upon the plaintiff to prove his case. The plaintiff having undertaken to prove it and having failed to do so cannot now fall back upon the partial admission of one of the defendants and ask for a separate decree against him. We are of opinion that when the plaintiff has failed to prove the alleged adoption of Jwala Datt, without proving which he cannot possibly succeed, his whole suit must fail against all the defendants. The plaintiff has in no way been prejudiced and no question of estoppel can arise under the circumstances.

In our opinion the appeal is without force and is hereby dismissed with costs.

We direct that the respondents will be entitled to one set of costs for counsel's fee as against the plaintiff appellant, in addition to the printing and other charges legally taxable. Counsel's fee is allowed to be divided equally between respondents Nos. 1 and 2 (first set), respondent No. 3 Jai Bhagavan (second set) and respondent No. 4, Lala Fateh Chand (third set).

Lala Fateh Chand has filed a set of cross-objections challenging some of the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge as well as urging that the amount of costs awarded to him should be increased by a sum of Rs. 216-10-8. As the decree was in his favour it was unnecessary for Lala Fateh Chand to file any separate objection. As to the question of costs we are of opinion that in view of the unsatisfactory defence set up by him we should make no modification. The result is that the cross-objections are dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

F. A. No. 386 of 1920, Decided on 5th November 1923, from the decree of the Second Addl. Sub. J., Aligarh D/-10th September 1920.

(a) Evidence—Local inspection by judge can be relied upon by him to decide the truth or falsity of witnesses.

Where plaintiff's evidence is not convincing but the defendant has produced practically no evidence, the Court can rely on the local inspection made by itself to determine whether the plaintiff's story is correct. [P. 154, C. 1]

(b) Mortgage- Construction — Payment of arrears of revenue by mortgagor does not include time-barred rent-decrees obtained by mortgagee.

Under the terms of the mortgage the mortgagor was to be liable at the time of redemption to pay to the mortgagee all sums due in respect of arrears from the tenants.

Held that the intention of the parties was that the mortgagor should pay up the arrears to the mortgagee when the latter vacated the possession and that he in turn was to acquire the right of realizing the arrears from the tenants after he himself had been put into possession after redemption, but this claim does not include payment in lieu of time barred decrees obtained by the mortgagee against tenants. [P. 154, C. 2]

(c) T. P. Act, S. 63—Mortgagee granting occupancy rights on reciept of Nazarana—Mortgagor is entitled to Nazarana.

Mortgagees during their period of possession by their failure to eject non-occupancy tenants, allowed them to acquire occupancy rights and in some cases occupancy rights were actually granted to non-occupancy tenants in return for Nazrana (a premium),

Held that the land after occupancy rights have accrued in it cannot be sovaluable to the landlord as it was before those rights came into existence. And if it is the duty of a mortgagee to take such care f the property as a prudent man would, he certainly is not entitled to hand the property back to the mortgagor in a worse condition than he received it. Therefore the plaintiffs mortgagors were entitled to the sum of Nazarana. [P. 155, C. 1]

Lindsay, J.—This is an appeal from a suit brought for redemption by the plaintiffs-respondents.

The appellants here are the defendants mortgagees.

In addition to the appeal we have also before us cross-objections put forward against the decree of the Court below by the plaintiffs-respondents.

It is not necessary to set out the facts of the case in any great detail. The dispute between the parties here is with regard to certain items of the mortgage account. The defendants-mortgagees complain that certain items ought to have been allowed to them by the Court below. In turn the plaintiffs-mortgagors complain that the lower Court has not given them credit for certain items to which they were entitled.

We deal first with the appeal of the defendants appellants, the mortgagees.

One claim which was made in the suit for redemption was that these mortgagees had during the continuance of the mortgage cut a large number of trees the value of which was assessed at Rs. 3,000/—.

The plaintiffs therefore asked the Court to allow this sum of Rs. 3000/- by deduction from the mortgage money payable in order to get redemption.

The learned Judge of the Court below came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to a deduction of Rs. 2,950/—.He found with respect to one tree that there was no evidence regarding its value, the value having been assessed by the plaintiffs at Rs. 50/—.He therefore disallowed this item.

The defence set up was that the mortgagees never cut down the trees as alleged by the plaintiffs. There was a direct conflict of evidence and the learned Judge, as we have already said, has found in favour of the plaintiffs.

Four witnesses were examined on behalf of the plaintiffs in order to prove that these trees had been cut and that a sum of close on Rs 3000/- had been obtained by selling them. Much criticism has been bestowed on the testimony of these witnesses and it may at once be acknowledged that their evidence is not perhaps of the highest class. On the other hand, as opposed to it, we have nothing but the bare denial of one of the mortgagees who appeared as a witness and whose testimony was supported by the evidence of a partisan witness whose satatement may be disregarded altogether.

During the course of the trial the Subordinate Judge made an inspection of the spot and recorded a note of, what he had observed at the time of his visit. Relying principally upon the result of his observation the learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the story for the plaintiffs was probably true and that the trees had been cut as alleged.

We have felt the force of the observations which have been addressed to us on behalf of the defendants appellants regarding the plaintiffs' evidence in this respect. On the other hand is the consideration that the learned Judge of the Court below had the witnesses before him and he seems to have been satisfied on the whole that they were telling the truth. He has given reasons for awarding credit to the story told by the plaintiffs and he certainly had some solid ground to go on the fact that he himself had been to the spot and had observed certain indications that trees had been cut. It is perfectly true that the Subordinate Judge could not as the result of his examination of the locality determine how many trees had been cut or by whom. At the same time he is perfectly justified in holding that what he saw at the time of his visit entitles him to award preference to the story which has been told on behalf of the plaintiffs and to reject the story which was put forward on behalf of the mortgagees, namely, that no trees had been cut at all.

On this part of the case therefore, we must decline to interfere with the finding of the Court below. We certainly are not in a position to say that the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge on this part of the case is wrong.

The next point which had been raised on behalf of the mortgagee appellants is that the Court below wrongly refused to allow them certain sums which were claimed to be owing as arrears of rent.

Under the terms of the mortgage the mortgagor was to be liable at the time of redemption to pay to the mortgagee all sums which were due in respect of arrears from the tenants

As we understand this term of the mortgage, the intention of the parties was, that the mortgagor should pay up the arrears to the mortgagee when the latter vacated possession and that he in turn was to acquire the right of realizing the arrears from the tenants after he himself had been put into possession after redemption.

The present claim that has been made by the mortgagee appellants for the arrears is based upon a series of decrees all of which are now time-barred. It is quite obvious therefore, that if this sum now claimed by the mortgagees were allowed and if the decrees were transferred to the mortgagor after redemption, the decrees would be of no use whatever to the mortgagor. They cannot now be executed by reason of lapse of time. It seems to us therefore that on a proper construction of the mortgage deed and the true intention of the parties this claim for arrears should not be allowed. As for any claim for further arrears over and above those mentioned in the decrees to which we have referred, all we need say is that there is no proof of it. Further, we find no provision in the mortgage deed for the payment of interest on the arrears of rent and the claim for interest therefore which is also put forward must be rejected.

This disposes of the case of the defendants appellants.

The cross-objections raise really two points. In the first place, it is said that the lower Court ought to have awarded damages to the plaintiffs by reason of losses which they have incurred in the following way:— It is said that these mortgagees during their period of possession, by their failure to eject non-occupancy tenants, allowed these tenants to acquire occupancy rights. In some cases it is alleged that occupancy rights were actually granted to non-occupancy tenants in return for nazrana (a premium).

The finding of the Subordinate Judge is that it is proved that a sum of Rs. 580/ was realised by the mortgagees in return for the grant of occupancy rights.

The Subordinate Judge however refused to allow this sum to the plaintiffs. He gives a variety of reasons for his decision none of which appeals to us. He says, for example, that it can make no difference to the mortgagor whether the land which he has to get back after redemption is burdened with occupancy rights. That is obviously an erroneous conclusion.

It seems to us to be quite clear that the land, after occupancy rights have accrued, cannot be so valuable to the landlord as it was before those rights came into existence. And if it is the duty of a mortgagee to take such care of the property as a prudent man would, he certainly is not entitled to hand the property back to the mortgagor in a worse condition than he received it.

We find therefore that occupancy rights have accrued on this land, and those rights, we take it, cannot now be extinguished. We can see no reason therefore for denying the plaintiffs this sum of Rs. 580/- and we cannot see that the mortgagee has any right whatever to retain this money. Allowance therefore must be made for this sum in calculating the amount which is to be paid for redemption. The fact is, that by conferring occupancy rights in return for payment of a premium the mortgagee has been conveying away certain rights of the owner of the property and he is not entitled to retain the money which he has got for granting those rights and at the same time to return the land burdened with those rights to the owner, the mortgagor.

We hold therefore that the sum of Rs. 580/- ought to be allowed to the mortgagors by reduction of the sum found payable by the Court below.

The other claim which has been put forward on behalf of the mortgagors is, we may say at once, quite untenable.

When the mortgage was made by Musammat Shiam Kunwar in the year 1905 it was arranged between her and the mortgagee that she was to remain in possession of an area o cultivated land measuring 67 bighas. A portion of this was to be held on payment of rent amounting to Rs. 90 a year and the remainder was to be held rent-free, and it was expressly stipulated between the parties that while the mortgage continued, the lady was to be allowed to retain possession of all this land, the only right of the mortgagee being that of receiving annually the sum of Rs. 90/- from Musammat Shiam Kunwar.

The plaintiffs ask us to hold that when Shiam Kunwar sold the equity of redemption to them in the year 1914 they acquired the right to take over possession of this land, that is to say, the tenancy right which Musammat Shiam Kunwar had obtained by agreement with the mortgagee when the mortgage was made in the year 1905.

One obstacle to the entertainment of this argument is the fact that the deed of transfer by which the equity of redemption was sold to the plaintiffs does not in terms confer upon them any right to occupy the land which remained in Shiam Kunwar's possession under the terms of the mortgage. It would therefore be a sufficient answer to the case of the plaintiffs to say that they have shown no right to set up any claim in respect of compensation or damages relating to the occupation by Musammat Shiam Kunwar of these 67 bighas.

It was argued further that being entitled to possession of this land the plaintiffs were justified in calling upon the mortgagees to eject Musammat Shiam Kunwar and they therefore asked for damages because the mortgagees refused to eject the lady.

But it is quite clear from the terms of the mortgage that the mortgagees could have had no right whatever to eject Musammat Shiam Kunwar as long as the mortgage subsisted. There is, as we have said, an express provision relating to this matter in the mortgage and it is futile to contend that in any case the plaintiffs, after their purchase of the right to redeem, had a right to call upon the mortgagees to eject Musammat Shiam Kunwar. This part of the case put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs respondents must therefore fail.

The result of all this is that we find no force in the appeal of the defendants appellants and direct that it be dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

As regards the cross-objections we think the plaintiffs respondents are entitled to succeed to the extent of the sum of Rs. 580/- which will be deducted from the amount declared to be payable by them for the purpose of obtaining redemption. In the cross-objections therefore we allow the parties costs in proportion to success and failure including in this Court, fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Judgment.—We are concerned in this appeal with a sale-deed dated the 20th September 1916, whereby the plaintiff Bishambhar Nath purported to convey to the defendant Muhammad Said a four annas share in certain zamindari property in the village of Kurian near Cawnpore. There are two issues for determination :—

(1) Was Bishambhar Nath a minor on the 20th of September 1916?

(2) If the first issue be found in the affirmative, should the decree in favour of the plaintiff be made subject to repayment of any consideration actually received by him from the defendant on account of the sale-deed in question?

[The evidence bearing on the first issue was then examined and it was held that Bishambhar Nath was a minor on the 20th of September 1916.]

We now turn to the second question. Should the decree in favour of the plaintiff be made subject to any and what conditions of repayment?

Notwithstanding that the effect of our first finding is to declare the contract between the parties destitute of legal effect we are of opinion that we have an equitable power wholly distinct from the existence of a contractual or non-contractual relation of the parties, which entitles us in a case of this kind to make a decree conditional upon repayment. In each case the test must be the conduct of the parties. On the one hand, the father of the plaintiff contends that the defendant and his father have brought about the moral and financial ruin of his two sons. He maintains that Abdul Aziz secured influence over Sheo Narain, influenced him adversely to his own interests and those of his father, acquired the whole of his share of the family property, and by putting him in funds enabled him to commence a course of dissipation. Similarly when Bishambhar Nath, in July 1916 was minded to raise money he was brought by Sheo Narain to the defendant and the latter adopted the same course with him and most carefully and cautiously kept all knowledge of his transactions with Bishambhar Nath from the father. He accepted from Sheo Narain a document of doubtful authenticity, the horoscope; he relied upon a paragraph in a written statement of the father, he contended himself with a medical certificate whereas, it is contended he ought to have gone to the father and told him of the son's intentions and asked him for proof of his age. It is said that he did not do so as he was well aware that the father would have disapproved strongly of the suggested transactions and would have asserted his son's minority, and as against the defendant the case has been put as one of studied abstention on his part from all communication with the father and as one on which he was prepared to take risk actuated by a desire to add to the property originally owned by Sheo Narain that of his brother Bishambhar Nath.

In one view of the case it is possible that Sheo Narain and Bishambar Nath did perpetrate a fraud upon the defendant. They may have 'planted' a forged horoscope upon him and Sheo Narain may have made verbal representations as to the age of Bishambhar Nath. This is however largely matter of surmise and proof of these matters was on the defendant. He failed to give the requisite proof. Whilst due protection must be given to persons in the position of the defendant, when victims of a clear fraud, they must nevertheless make out a plain case for equitable relief and the very request for such relief puts upon the Court the obligation of looking carefully into the conduct of the petitioner in each case. We think that the father of the minor plaintiff is right in charging the defendant with having been to some extent unscrupulous in his dealings with his two sons and as regards Bishambar Nath we think in the defendant's anxiety to acquire the property he was content to run some degree of risk. Purchasers or money-lenders who deal with persons who are hovering upon majority and whose ascertainment of exact age is impossible must not complain if their cupidity leads them at times into litigation and loss. We are of opinion that we ought not to exercise our powers of equitable relief in this case and that the appeal must be dismissed. We however direct that in this and the trial Court each party shall pay his own costs.

Appeal dismissed.

U. P. Municipalities Act, S. 267—Board can ask for demolition of a structure previously permitted to be built by them.

The plaintiff's latrine of the kind known as sandas originally opened on the east side of the house and was cleaned from that side. In January 1919 he applied for permission to reconstruct it so that it should open on the south side of the house and permission was granted by the Public Works Committee on 15th February 1919. The proposed alterations were thereupon carried out. About eight months afterwards a complaint was made to the Municipal Board that the latrine as altered gave forth a very unsavoury smell and constituted a public nuisance and a danger to the health of the persons living in the neighbourhood. The Board were satisfied after inspection by the Health Officer that this was the case and they thereupon issued notice to the plaintiff under S. 267 of the Act to close the latrine. The plaintiff then sued for a declaration that the resolution of the Municipal Board ordering his latrine to be closed was not authorised by law and for an injunction restraining the Municipal Board from taking any step in respect of it.

Held: that it is impossible to point to any provision in U. P. Municipalities Act which debars a Municipal Board from taking action under S. 267 in the interests of the public health solely because it has previously given sanction to the construction of the building in question under S. 180 of the Act. On the contrary there is an express provision in S. 184 that no sanction shall operate as an estoppel or confer or extinguish any right or disability. 45 Bom. 797 Dist. [P 158, C 2]

Daniels J.—These two connected appeals raise a question whether a Municipal Board has power under S. 267 of the U. P. Municipalities Act to order the removal of a latrine for the construction of which it had previously given permision. The plaintiff's latrine is of the kind known as sandas. It originally opened on the east side of the house and was cleaned from that side. In January 1919 he applied for permission to re-construct it so that it should open on the south side of the house. This application was made under S. 178 of the U. P. Municipalities Act and permission was granted by the Public Works Committee on 15th February 1919. The proposed alterations were thereupon carried out. About eight months afterwards a compl int was made to the Municipal Board that the latrine as altered gave forth a very unsavoury smell and constituted a public nuisance and a danger to the health of the persons living in the neighbourhood. The Board were satisfied after inspection by the Health Officer that this was the case and they thereupon issued notice to the plaintiff under S 267 of the Act to close the latrine. This suit was then instituted by the plaintiff praying for a declaration that the resolution of the Municipal Board ordering his latrine to be closed was not authorised by law, and for an injunction restraining the Municipal Board from taking any steps in respect of it.

The suit has been dismissed by the Court below. The plaintiff appeals and pleads that the action of the Municipal Board was u'tra vires. The appellant relies on a decision of the Bombay High Court in Municipality of Sholapur v. Abdul Wahab (1), and argues on general grounds that very great injustice may result if it is held to be within the competence of a Municipal Board to order the demolition of a building or part of a building the erection of which it has previously sanctioned. The Bombay case is not quite on all fours with the present case as the Municipality formally revoked a sanction to build which it had previously granted. The case was moreover decided on a construction of S. 96 of the Bombay Municipal Act the provisions of which, though generally similar to those of the U. P. Municipalities Act, are not identical.

As regards the second plea there is no doubt that great hardship might be caused if the Municipal Board abused its powers under the Act. This must necessarily be the case whenever a public body is entrusted with wide statutory powers. At the same time very grave public inconvenience might equally arise if a Municipal Board is held to be debarred from taking action against what is undoubtedly a nuisance because on some previous occasion it had sanctioned the erection of the building from which the nuisance proceeds. The case must be decided, not on general considerations, but on a construction of the Municipalities Act in force in these Provinces. It is impossible to point to any provision in this Act which debars a Municipal Board from taking action under S. 267 in the interests of the public health solely because it has previously given sanction to the construction of the building in question under S. 180 of the Act. On the contrary there is an express provision in S. 184 that no sanction shall operate as an estoppel or confer or extinguish any right or disability. It is argued on behalf of the appellant that the reference to estoppel refers only to an estoppel against a plea of title to property, but the words used are very wide and taken in their ordinary meaning certainly do provide that no estoppel shall be raised against a Municipal Board on the ground of its having granted any sanction under the preceding sections. It may be added that the lower appellate Court finds as a fact that the latrine as it now exists does amount to a nuisance, and therefore the order complained of was in fact a proper order, though the Municipal Board acted without sufficient care in originally granting sanction for the alteration of the latrine. I agree with the Court below that the notice issued by the Municipal Board was within its statutory powers and I accordingly dismiss the appeals with costs.

There is deficiency of Rs. 5 on account of Court fees due from the respondent Municipal Board in appeal No. 1636. The decree of this Court will therefore not issue until this has been made good.

The cross-objection regarding costs was not pressed. It is accordingly dismissed but without costs.

Appeals & cross-objection dismissed.

Easements Act, S. 18—Customary easement of any nature can exist against landlord.

The first illustration to S. 18 expressly recognises that a tenant may have a customary right of easement against his landlord. A customary easement is not limited to easements of a kind which could not be recognised at all apart from special customs such as the right of pasturage and the right of privacy referred to in the illustrations. Any kind of easement recognised by custom of the provinces would surely fall within the meaning of the term. [P 159, C 2]

M. L. Agarwala—for Appellants.

S. N. Mukerji—for Respondents.

Judgment. —The plaintiffs appellants are zamindars of mauza Budpur and the defendants are occupancy tenants in the same village. The present suit was brought by the plaintiffs for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from making use of a way through fields Nos. 131,505 and 505. The suit was filed on the 9th August 1920 and the allegation in the plaint was that the defendants only began to make use of the way through this land from December 1919. The Court below differing from the Munsif finds that the way in reality is an old way which had been in use since the time of the settlement nearly 30 years ago and has dismissed the suit. In appeal to this Court it was objected that the Subordinate Judge did not state the precise ground on which he based his judgment, and it was argued that even if the way was an old one the zamindar was entitled to close it. Under the Full Bench ruling as Udit Singh v. Kashi Ram (1) a tenant could not acquire by prescription an easement against his landlord and it was found by the trial Court and not disputed in appeal that the right claimed was not an easement of necessity in the technical sense. The defendants when challenged asserted that they claimed the right as a customary right or as a customary easement under S. 18 of the Easements Act. It was pointed out that the first illustration to S. 18 expressly recognises that a tenant may have a customary right of easement against his landlord. I thereupon remitted an issue to the Court below on this plea. The Court below finds that a customary right of easement is established in favour of the defendants.

The appellant has challenged this finding on the ground that the Court below has mistaken the nature of customary easement. It is urged that a customary easement is limited to easements of a kind which could not be recognised at all apart from special customs such as the right of pasturage and the right of privacy referred to in the illustrations. Although this is the view taken in Peacock's Easement, I know of no warrant for limiting the term in this manner. Any kind of easement recognised by the custom of the province would surely fall within the meaning of the term. Now it is in my opinion beyond doubt that according to the customs prevailing in these provinces a zamindar has no right arbitrarily to close a way which has been used by occupancy tenants of the village for 30 years without question or opposition for access to their fields and for removing their produce. The plaintiff himself never claimed any such right. He came into Court (as in all cases of this kind which have ever come up before me) on the allegation that the way was newly made. It is only in the stage of appeal through the mouth of his counsel that he asserts his unrestricted right to close a way however old. If the right cannot be claimed as an easement I should be prepared to assume a grant of the right as appurtenant to the tenancy from the fact of long user and long acquiescence by the plaintiff. The zamindar having acquiesced in the use of the disputed way by the defendants for a period of 30 years it is too late for him to turn round and deny their right to use it. On his findings of fact the learned Subordinate Judge was in my opinion right in dismissing the suit and I accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Plaintiff is entitled to an order directing the defendant to remove the trees standing on his plot, where the parties were the co-sharers of the village; but by a partition the said plot was awarded to the plaintiff and the trees standing thereon were awarded to the defendant. S. 118 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act has no application to such a case by analogy or otherwise. [P. 160 C. 2]

Judgment.—The question for consideration in this case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to an order directing the defend nt to remove the trees standing on old plot No. 97-13 corresponding with No. 123 new khasra of mauza Simra Tappa. The parties were co-sharers of the village; but by a partition effected in 1909 the said plot was awarded to the plaintiff and the trees standing thereon were awarded to the defendant. The entire plot No 97 was apparently a waste land covered by trees. The partition record summoned shows that one of the co-sharers Musammat Amna claimed the entire plot as her separate maqbuza land; but the Assistant Collector held that the plot in question was not her maqbuza land and could not be allotted to her share with the trees standing thereon. That order was upheld on appeal by the Collector. The result thereof was that the land was divided separately from the trees; and some of the trees fell to the share of the defendant; while others fell to the shares of the other co-sharers. S. 118 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act has no application by analogy or otherwise. S. 119 might have been applicable, had it been alleged that the trees in question had been planted and possessed by the defendant or his predecessor-in-interest prior to the partition; but there is no allegation in the written statement that that was so. On the other hand it is admitted that the other co sharers have caused the trees owned by them cut down since the partition, showing thereby that the land in question was jungle land, and that the trees partitioned belonged to the co-sharers of the village. They were separately partitioned according to their value and divided between the co-sharers in proportion to their shares. Paragraph 9 of the tarz taqsim prepared at the time of the partition directed that the trees scattered about the village were to be divided in that manner between the co-sharers according to their value and share. The decision in Sarup v. Lala (1) does not apply because that was a case of house occupied by one co-sharer at the time of partion, the site whereof was allotted to another co-sharer and S. 118 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act applied Where the trees are scattered trees standing on waste land, that consideration does not arise; and if a co-sharer files a suit within 12 years from the date of the partition for the removal of the trees allotted to one co-sharer and standing on the land allotted to another co-sharer he is entitled to have the same removed. and the land vacated. The defendant has no right to stay on the land against the will of the plaintiff. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

F. A. No. 79 of 1920, Decided on 6th November 1923, from the decree of the S. J. Agra., D/- 8th January 1920.

Civil P. C., S. 13 (c)—Foreign Court following another Limitation Law and passing judgment on that basis—British Indian Court cannot question its judgment—Appearance of defendants implies waiver of plea of want of jurisdiction.

A foreign judgment must be enforced by the Courts in British India in every case in which the judgment-debtor had valuntarily appeared before the foriegn Court which passed the judgment.

A suit was brought in British India and was founded on a judgment passed by Dholpur Court (foreign Court). It was pleaded that if the suit upon which the foreign judgment was passed had been brought in British India it would have been held to be time-barred under the law of limitation in operation in British India, but the Law of Limitation in Dholpur not being the same as the Law in British India the remedy in Dholpur was not time barred.

Held that there had been no refusal to recognise the Law of British India, in this case; A Court which entertains a suit on a foreign judgment cannot institute an enquiry into the merits of the original action or the propriety of the decision. [P. 162 C. 1]

U. S. Bajpai and N. Asthana—for Appellants.

G. Lal and B. Prasad—for Respondents.

Stuart, J.—This appeal was filed by Ganga Prasad and Ram Rattan, defendants in the original suit. There were other defendants in the original suit but the decree was passed against Ganga Prasad and Ram Rattan alone. While the appeal was pending Ganga Prasad died. His representatives are on the record. Later on Ram Rattan died. His representatives have not been brought on the record, and under the law they cannot be brought on now. The appeal must therefore be taken to have abated as far as Ram Rattan is concerned. It has been argued on behalf of the representatives of Ganga Prasad.

The facts may be stated very briefly. A decree was obtained by the plaintiffs respondents against Ganga Prasad, Ram Rattan and others in the Court of the additional Judge of Dholpur on the 30th of April, 1913. The decree was for a sum of money. A portion of this amount was realised by execution of the decree, and the plaintiffs instituted the suit out of which this appeal has arisen to recover the balance upon the foreign judgment of the Dholpur Court. In the course of the trial Ganga Prasad and Ram Rattan set up that the Dholpur Court had no jurisdiction, and they further set up that the judgment of the Dholpur Court could not be operative in the Court in British India inasmuch as it proceeded on a refusal to recognise the law of British India in a case in which such law was applicable.

The learned Subordinate Judge repelled these and the other pleas, and decreed the suit as against Ganga Prasad and Ram Rattan, the remaining defendants being held not liable by consent of the plaintiffs.

The present appeal is preferred and the only points argued before us were that the Dholpur Court had no jurisdiction and that judgment was founded on a refusal to recognise the law of British India.

In respect of the first point we consider it sufficient to say that inasmuch as the appellants Ganga Prasad and Ram Rattan themselves appeared and contested the claim in the Dholpur Court, the plea of jurisdiction cannot be raised. We need specify no further authority for this conclusion than the decision in Emanuel v. Symon (1). At page 309 it is laid down that a foreign judgment must be enforced by the Courts in England in every case in which the judgment-debtor had voluntarily appeared before the foreign Court which passed the judgment. The law is the same in British India. It is laid down in the decisions of the High Court in Madras which have been quoted by the Subordinate Judge.

The second plea is as follows. If the suit upon which the foreign judgment was passed had been brought in British India, it would have been held to be time barred under the law of limitation in operation in British India; but the law of limitation in Dholpur is not the same as the law in British India and the remedy in Dholpur was not time barred. This is a case in which it cannot be suggested that there has been a refusal to recognise the law of British India where such law was applicable. The general rule is that a Court which entertains a suit on a foreign judgment cannot institute an enquiry into the merits of the original action, or the propriety of the decision, and that rule applies here.

For the above reasons we dismiss the appeal of Ganga Prasad with costs and fees on the higher scale. The appeal of Ram Rattan has abated.

Appeal dismissed.

Durga Prasad—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The question for consideration in this appeal is whether the appeal filed in the Court below was filed within time. The order appealed against was passed on the 7th January 1921, but by a mistake of the office, no formal order was prepared. On the same day the plaintiff applied for a copy of the judgment and that copy became ready for delivery and was delivered to him on the 14th January 1921. He filed an appeal on the 4th February 1921, accompanied by a copy of the judgment, but without any copy of the decree, for no decree was then in existence. The appellate Court brought to his notice that a copy of the decree should also have been filed. On the 10th February 1921 he applied for a copy of the decree. On 15th February 1921 the formal order was drawn up and a copy of that formal order became ready on the 17th February 1921 and was delivered to him two days later. The reason for the delay in delivery is not ascertainable. On the 23rd February 1921 he filed the copy of the formal order in the appeal, but the Court below held that it was filed too late and the appeal was barred by time. Under S. 12 of the Indian Limitation Act (Act 9 of 1908) the appellant is entitled to have excluded the time spent in obtaining a copy of the decree and also that of the judgment. Deducting the time spent in obtaining the copy of the judgment, the limitation for filing the appeal did not expire till the 14th February 1921.

Before that date he had applied for a copy of the formal order. He could not have applied earlier with any benefit because the formal order was prepared while the application for a copy of it was pending, and adding the time spent in obtaining the copy of the formal order the appeal was clearly within time. As pointed out in Kamala Dasi v. Tarapada Mukherji (1) in cases in which an order is not drawn up, it is sufficient for the appellant to attach to his memorandum of appeal a copy of the judgment alone and time can run from the date of the judgment, but where a separate order is drawn up, copies of both the judgment and the formal order ought to be attached to the memorandum of appeal and the appellant is entitled to a deduction of the time spent in obtaining copies thereof. In Chinnappan Chetty v. The Secretary of State for India (2) it was held that where no formal order has been prepared, the appellate Court should adjourn the appeal until the copy of the decree is forthcoming. The decision in Mulraj v. Madar Mal (3) does not apply because there the period of limitation for filing the appeal had run out and there is nothing to show whether a copy of the decree was or was not obtainable. The appeal must therefore be allowed and the case is remanded to the lower appellate Court with a direction to re-instate it to its original number and to dispose of it according to law. The costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Appeal allowed.

S. A. No. 40 of 1922, Decided on 5th April 1923, from a decree of the Addl. Dt. Judge, Meerut.

Civil P. C., S. 11—Decision that A is tenant does not preclude the plea that B sowed the land.

The decision of the Rent Court to the effect that a certain person was the tenant of the land and was liable for the rent does not decide the question of the title to the sale-proceeds of the crop in that field so as to bar a claim that another person grew the crop. [P. 161 C. 1]

Kailas Nath Katju—for Appellant.

Peary Lal Banerji—for Respondent.

Lindsay, J.—In our opinion this appeal ought to be allowed. We think that the decision of the Court below that the present claim was barred by res-judicata is erroneous.

The appellant was the plaintiff in the suit and he brought this suit for a declaration of his title to a certain sum of money which was held in deposit under an order made by a Magistrate of the first class.

It appears that in the later part of the year 1919, a dispute arose between the present plaintiff and the defendant regarding some land, on which sugar-cane had been sown. Proceedings were taken under S. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The crop was attached and sold by the order of the Magistrate, and the money was thereafter ordered to be kept in deposit.

The plaintiff says that he is the man who sowed this crop, and is, therefore, entitled to the sale-proceeds. The case for the defendant, on the other hand, was that he was the tenant of the land; that he sowed the crops, and that he had a title to the money.

The Court of first instance has found that the crop in question was sowed and raised by the plaintiff, but it was of opinion that because there had been a decision by the Rent Court regarding the question of tenancy, it was not possible to give the plaintiff relief inasmuch as it had been held in the proceedings referred to that the tenant of the land was the defendant Jaggu and not the plaintiff Tota.

In order to explain this matter it is necessary to refer to the litigation in the Rent Court. A suit for arrears of rent was brought by the zemindar for the years 1325, 1326 and 1327 Fasli. This suit was brought against both Tota and Jaggu, the allegation of the landlord being that he was not sure which of these defendants was his tenant. Both defendants claimed to be tenants of the holding. In that suit it was decided that Tota had been the tenant of the holding up to the end of the year 1326 Fasli, corresponding with the 1st of July, 1919, while Jaggu was held to have become the tenant of the holding from the beginning of 1327 Fasli. The result of this was that the zemindar got a decree against Tota for the arrears of rent for 1325 Fasli, and for the arrears of rent for 1327 Fasli against Jaggu. That decision of the Rent Court was upheld in appeal by the Additional District Judge.

It is on the strength of this decision that both the Courts below have not held that the plaintiff cannot succeed in this claim. The Courts have taken the view that because it was held in the proceedings in the Rent Court that Jaggu was the tenant of this land for the year 1327, it is impossible now for Tota to put forward the claim that he is entitled to the sale proceeds of this crop, which grew during the year 1327 Fasli. In the first place, we are not disposed to hold that the question as to who sowed this sugar-cane crop and raised it was a matter, which was substantially in issue in the suit which was filed in the Revenue Court, and, in any case, it is clear to us that the decision of the Rent Court to the effect that Jaggu was the tenant of this land and was liable for the rent of the year 1327 Fasli, would not decide the question of the title to the sale-proceeds of the sugar-cane crop. This is apparent, if it is remembered, that sugar-cane is a crop which is sown in the month of March or April, and is not finally gathered until late in November or the beginning of December.

Obviously, therefore, this sugar-cane crop, which was standing on this land in November, 1919, and was sold at or about that time, must have been sown early in the year, that is to say, about the month of March or April, 1919, and the judgment of the Rent Court on this point is clear, namely, that at the time when the crop was sown Tota was still the tenant of the holding We have already mentioned that it was held in the rent suit that Tota was the tenant of the land up till, at any rate, the 1st of July, 1919. There can, we think be no doubt that Tota sowed this crop and he must have tended it until it was well advanced, and, in the circumstances, we hold that he is entitled to recover this money.

We are clearly of opinion that the decision in the suit for arrears of rent does not constitute res-judicata for the purpose of barring the present claim.

We, therefore, allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and direct that the plaintiff's claim be decreed with Costs in all three Courts.

Ryves, J.—That a riot took place about sunset in the village of Rawatpur on the 22nd of January last in which one Abid Ali unfortunately was fatally injured is established beyond doubt. Ten men were sent up for trial under Ss 147 and 304 of the Indian Penal Code to the Court of Sessions at Shahjahanpur. The learned Judge convicted three of them and these have appealed. The learned Judge has come to the definite conclusion that the evidence on both sides is wholly unreliable' He says, "as the witnesses on both sides are unreliable there remains only the reports on which to base any definite conclusion". This is not a legitimate use of a first information report. Such reports are not substantive evidence of the facts recorded in them and a conviction cannot be based on a report. They can be used to corroborate the witnesses who made them and are of value as showing that they told the same story at the first possible occasion. If they told a different story in Court, the first report can be used to contradict them or discredit their testimony. But it is not legitimate for a Court when witnesses tell a different story in the witness box and contradict the report made by them, to discard the evidence given on oath and to rely on the report. The result probably is that there has been a miscarriage of justice in this case, but that is not the fault of the Court but of the complainants themselves and their witnesses. If they choose to suppress the real facts and give false evidence in order to implicate their enemies the only result is that persons who are probably guilty have to be acquitted. Judgment—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit for ejectment under S. 63 of the Tenancy Act. The plaintiff is alone entitled to collect the entire rent from the tenants. This has been clearly found by the learned District Judge. The learned District Judge however, was of opinion that though the plaintiff was entitled to the entire rent he was not entitled to eject the defendant without the concurrence of the entire body of co-sharers. It is hardly necessary to point out that this view if correct would be productive of great inconveniences, especially in the eastern districts where co-sharers are often very numerous. The learned District Judge gives two reasons in support of his decision. The first is that S. 194 only makes an exception in the case of money suits, and the other that the word 'landholder' does not occur in S. 58 of the Tenancy Act. The reference to S. 194 is doubtless to sub-section (3). This sub-section however only applies where one of two or more co-sharers is not entitled to sue alone which is the whole point in dispute in this case. It is quite true, as the learned District Judge says, that S. 58 does not contain the word 'landholder.' There is no reason why it should as it only specifies the grounds of ejectment. The operative section under which the tenant is ejected is S. 63, and the very opening words of this section are "when a landholder desires to eject a tenant." 'Landholder' is defined in S. 4 (5) as the person to whom rent is payable, and it is in my opinion clear law that the co-sharer who is entitled to collect the entire rent of a particular tenant is also entitled to eject him. He is the landholder for the purposes of the act. This view was also taken by the Board of Revenue in Select Decision No. 2 of 1910, a decision which has been followed in many subsequent cases. I am told by Mr. Agarwala that this decision has recently been dissented from by the present junior member in a ruling which has not yet been reported. However that may be, it is in my opinion good law. It was finally urged by Mr. Agarwala for the respondents that the District Judge's decision does not cover all the pleas which were urged before him. I have accordingly been through the grounds of appeal with the counsel and it is found that the only plea that can be said to be not covered by the judgment is that contained in paragraph 6 of the memorandum of appeal. In that the defendant urged that he had acquired occupancy rights. This point is not covered either directly or by implication in the judgment of the Court below and the learned Judge does not say that it was not urged before him. I accordingly remit an issue under order 41 rule 25 to the lower appellate Court:—

Has Mt. Murta Kuer the defendant acquired occupancy rights in the land in suit?

On receipt of the finding, which should be submitted by 30th June, ten days will be allowed for objections. The finding will be decided on the evidence already on the record.

Hindu Law—Alienation by Widow—Gift as a dowry in marriage of her daughter to the daughter amounts to acceleration.

One G. died leaving his widow Mt. R. and his daughter Mt. J. R. inherited her husband's property as next heir. On the occassion of marriage of J. in 1881 she executed a document by which she transferred her rights in the husband's property which consisted of a share of Zamindari and a house, to her daughter Mt, J. J. was in possession for some years when she died, R. survived her. J. left a daughter S. who obtained possession upon the death of J. and remained in possession for more than 12 years. Plaintiff A was the son of B. who was the nephew of G. and was the next reversioner to the estate of G. Mt. R. died in 1918 and upon her death the present suit was brought by B. for recovery of the property from S.

Held that the plaintiff's right to succeed accrued upon the death of J. and that event having taken place more than 12 years prior to the institution of the suit, and S. having been in possession for more than 12 years without having any right, her possession thus amounted to adverse possession and the plaintiff's claim was beyond time and was rightly dismissed by the lower appellate Court It makes no difference that the transfer was made as a marriage gift. 42 M. 533 and 47 C. 466 Foll. Banerji, Ag. C J.—The property to which this litigation relates originally belonged to one Guptar, who died leaving his widow Mt. Raj Rani and his daughter Mt. Jaipali Raj Rani inherited the property as next heir to her husband. On the occasion of the marriage of Jaipali she executed a document by which she transferred her rights in the husband's property, which consisted of a share of zemindari and a house, to her daughter Mt. Jaipali. This she did in the year 1881. Jaipali was in possession for some years when she died, Raj Rani survived her. Jaipali left a daughter Sartaji, who is the defendant in this case. Sartaji has been found to have obtained possession upon the death of Jaipali and to have remained in possession for more than 12 years.

The plaintiff Ramjas is the son of Balraj, who was the nephew of Guptar, and is the next reversioner to the estate of Guptar. Mt. Raj Rani died in 1918 and upon her death the present suit was brought by Balraj for recovery of the property from Sartaji;

The Court of first instance decreed the claim but the lower appellate Court dismissed it. That Court was of opinion that there was a surrender by Raj Rani of her rights as a Hindu widow, and this amounted to an acceleration of the reversionary rights of Jaipali. Upon Jaipali's death the only person who could claim the property was Balraj and Balraj not having brought any claim in respect of this property and Sartaji having been allowed to remain in possession for more than twelve years she had acquired an absolute right to the property, and the plaintiff could not recover it.

This decision of the lower appellate court has been reversed by a learned Judge of this Court solely on the ground that the transfer to Jaipali was made at the time of her marriage and as a marriage gift. No doubt in the document which Raj Rani executed in 1881 in favour of Jaipali she says that she was making this transfer to her daughter as dowry on the occasion of her marriage. We think however that the fact that the transfer was made to her on the occasion of her marriage makes no difference so far as the rights acquired by Jaipali were concerned. Jaipali was the next reversioner to the estate after her mother. Her mother divested herself of the whole estate and transferred it to her daughter. This amounted to an acceleration of the right of her daughter to succeed to the estate of her father. It was held in the cases of Rangasami Gounden v. Naciappa Gounden (1) and Bhagwat Koer v. Dhanukdhari Prasad Singh (2) by their Lordships of the Privy Council that where the widow divests herself entirely of her estate and makes a transfer, the effect of which is an entire effacement of herself, it amounts to a vesting of the estate in the reversioner immediately upon the making of the transfer, whether this is called a surrender or an acceleration. It is not the form in which the transfer is made that is to be looked at but the effect which it would have on the estate itself. It cannot be held that what was transferred by Mt. Raj Rani to Jaipali was the life-estate of Raj Rani by way of gift as such life-estate. She completely effaced her own life estate, and thereupon the right, which Jaipali would have succeeded to on her death, became vested in her at once. In this view it was a case of surrender of the estate, and the fact of the surrender having been made on the occasion of the marriage of Mt. Jaipali in the shape of a gift, makes no difference. Upon the death of Jaipali the right to the property vested in the next reversioner to her father and not in her mother. Therefore the fact of her mother being alive for a number of years after the death of Jaipali does not affect the question of the plaintiff's right of succession. The plaintiff's right to succeed accrued upon the death of Jaipali and that event having taken place more than twelve years prior to the institution of the suit, and Sartaji having been in possession for more than twelve years without having any right, her possession thus amounted to adverse possession and the plaintiff's claim was beyond time and was rightly dismissed by the lower appellate Court. We allow the appeal set, aside the decree of the learned Judge of this Court and restore the decree of the lower appellate Court with costs of both hearing in this Court, including fees in this Court on the higher scale.

Kailas Nath Katju—for Appellant.

Banerji, J.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for specific performance of a contract for sale of a house and in the alternative for damages. It appears that the defendant wanted to sell a house, and for this purpose Abdul Aziz, a common friend of the parties to the suit, was negotiating with prospective purchasers. Abdul Aziz wrote to the defendant saying that a certain person was offering Rs. 3,600 for the house and was enquiring if the defendant would agree to sell the house. On the 13th of December, 1918, the defendant wrote back to Abdul Aziz saying that if the purchaser was willing to pay Rs. 4,000 for the house and the costs of transfer, he would sell the house. Abdul Aziz thereupon on the 21st of December, 1918, wrote to the defendant saying that one Panna Lal had accepted the terms proposed by the defendant and was sending a money order for Rs. 200 as earnest-money and the defendant was to send a formal receipt. It appears that the defendant received a money order for Rs. 200 on Saturday and wrote back saying that as the next day was a Sunday, he would send the receipt on the Monday following by registered post or under a bearing cover as desired by Abdul Aziz. Matters stopped here for some days. On the 5th of January, 1919, the defendant wrote to Abdul Aziz saying that he had received a telegram asking him for the return of Rs. 200 sent as earnest-money and he wanted to know if Panna Lal was going back out of the agreement. Later on he also said that the house really belonged to his wife and she refused to sell it. Ultimately the defendant refused to execute a sale-deed and then the plaintiff brought the present suit for specific performance of the contract to sell, and, in the alternative, for damages.

Several pleas were taken in defence and the main plea was that Abdul Aziz had by misrepresentation induced the defendant to agree to the sale of the house in December, 1918, and that it was owing to this misrepresentation that the defendant acted as he did, but that the defendant did not contract with the plaintiff to sell the property. The trial Court, the learned Subordinate Judge of Agra, came to the conclusion that the defendant had contracted to sell the house but he could not give a decree for specific performance of the contract, because the defendant was not competent to sell the house which belonged to his wife. He, however, gave a decree for damages and the refund of Rs. 200, the earnest-money already advanced. The defendant went up in appeal and the learned District Judge has confirmed the finding of the trial Court as to the amount of damages, but has allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit on the ground that there was no completed contract for sale. It is not very easy to understand how the learned District Judge came to this conclusion. Having regard to the correspondence to which we have referred above, there can be no question that there was a proposal by Abdul Aziz that the defendant made an offer to sell the house for Rs. 4,000 and the said offer was accepted by Panna Lal who sent Rs. 200 by money order as earnest-money. The learned Judge seems to be under the misapprehension that a receipt registered under the Registration Act was required for the Rs. 200 sent by Panna Lal as a condition precedent to the completion of the contract. This was clearly the result of a mis-reading of the correspondence between Abdul Aziz and the defendant. In the letter which Abdul Aziz wrote to the defendant, he asked the defendant to send a receipt by post under registered cover or bearing, and the defendant wrote back in reply saying that he would send it on Monday following by registered post or bearing. The learned Judge seems to think that this last letter meant that the receipt was to be registered under the Registration Act and then sent to Abdul Aziz. This was no body's case and the learned Judge seems to have misunderstood the defence and erred in deciding the case on a point not raised by the parties. In our opinion the judgment of the trial Court was correct and should not have been disturbed. We are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for a breach of the contract entered into with him by the defendant and that the measure of such damages is the difference between the market value of the property and the contractual price. The learned Judge accepts the amount assessed by the Court below as correct. We, therefore, allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs in this Court and in the Court below.

Appeal allowed.

Judgment.—The dispute in this case relates to a portion of plot No. 44 khasra situated in the village Pipri. That portion belonged to a joint family consisting of Salik Pande and his sons Ram Jag and Gajadhar. Salik Pande was the manager of the joint family. On the 2nd of July 1890 he and his son Ram Jag made a simple mortgage of the said property in favour of Jagannath. Subsequently on the 31st of January 1900 he and his co-sharers mortgaged their entire plot No. 44 khasra with Mangru and gave him possession. In 1903 Jagannath filed a suit for the recovery of the money due on his mortgage and obtained a decree in execution of which he purchased the mortgaged property. The other son and grandsons of Salik Pande were not made parties to that suit. Jagannath sold the share purchased by him to Jadubir Pande, who got mutation of names effected in his favour in the revenue papers in respect of the same.

The present suit was filed by one of the sons and some of the grandsons of Salik Pande for a declaration that the mortgage and auction sale aforesaid were not binding on them and for the maintenance of their possession over the same. Their allegation was that the mortgage in question was made without any legal necessity and that they had since acquired the rights of Mangru by paying the money due to him on the subsequent mortgage of the 31st of January 1900. The defendant Jadubir Pande opposed the claim on the ground that he had purchased the property in question in satisfaction of a prior mortgage, which was made for a valid family necessity. He denied that the plaintiff was in proprietary possession of the disputed property and pleaded that the claim was barred by limitation under S 42 of the Specific Relief Act. The Courts below repelled those contentions and decreed the claim. They found that the plaintiffs were in possession of the disputed property by virtue of their redemption of the subsequent mortgage and that the contesting defendant appellant had failed to establish that the mortgage of the 2nd of July 1890 was made for a legal necessity.

They, however overlooked the fact that the mortgaged property had already been sold in satisfaction of that mortgage, and rights of a third party had come into existence, which could not be displaced unless the sons and grandsons of Salik Pande, the mortgagor, were prepared to establish that the mortgage in question was made for illegal or immoral purposes

As observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Girdhari Lal v. Kantu Lal (1) where joint ancestral property has passed out of a joint family either under a conveyance executed by a father in consideration of an antecedent debt or in order to raise money to pay off an antecedent debt, or under a sale in execution of a decree for the father's debt, the sons cannot recover that property, unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted. In Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (2). Their Lordships re-affirmed that view. The sale was a public sale, which could have been presented by the plaintiffs, had they taken steps in time, by an assertion of their rights. They took no such steps; and they cannot now be permitted to defeat the rights acquired by a third party by simply questioning the transaction entered into by the head of the family, of which they were members. The Courts below erred in throwing the onus on the defendants, as if no sale had taken place, and the rights of the third party had not come into existence. It is no use sending the case back for disposal because in the plaint there was no allegation that the debt in question was incurred for illegal or immoral purposes. All that was said was that the mortgage was not taken for family necessity; but that ground is not enough to defeat the auction purchaser or his assignee of the rights acquired by virtue of the auction sale. The subsequent redemption made by the plaintiffs of the puisne mortgage cannot give them any higher title. The appeal must therefore be allowed and the claim of the plaintiffs dismissed with costs here and heitherto.

S. A. No. 666 of 1922, Decided on 30th July 1923, against the decree of of the D. J. Azamgarh, D/-11th February 1922.

Hindu Law—Alienation by father—Burden of proof of necessity on purchaser—Necessity proved for a portion—Sale set aside.

Where property has passed out of the hands of the family either in lieu of an antecedent debt or under an execution sale in respect of a debt of the father the sons can only recover the property by showing that the debt was either illegal or immoral, but this rule does not apply to a sale for cash. when a transaction such as this is impeached by the son it is for the creditor or transferee in the first instance to prove either legal necessity or at least such inquiry as would have satisfied a prudent man that the necessity existed, and the same rule applies where the defendant is not the original transferee but a pre-emptor.

Where necessity for a portion is proved, the Court should look to the amount of the consideration to which no legal necessity has been established. If this amount was so trifling that it could be left out of account the sale should be upheld, otherwise it should be set aside. In this case legal necessity was proved for Rs. 1780 out of Rs. 2500 but the sale was set aside. 41 A. 338 Dist 1922 A. 321 foll. [P. 171 C. 1, 2 P. 172 C. 1]

Judgment.—This is an appeal in a suit in which the plaintiff Bhagwat Singh suing as a minor through his next friend Ram Autar sought to recover possession of property sold by his father Gajadhar Singh on the ground that the property was the joint family property of the plaintiff and his father and that the sale was made without legal necessity. The sale was effected on 9th December 1914 for a sum of Rs. 2499-11-3. The Court below has held that Rs. 1780- of the sale price was for legal necessity or antecedent debt and has given the plaintiffs a decree subject to repayment of this amount. There were a number of defendants to the suit, Gajadhar Singh himself, the original vendees, and subsequent transferees, but the only one with whom we are now concerned is the appellant Chandrika Singh. Chandrika Singh filed a pre-emption suit on the basis of the sale deed executed by the plaintiff's father and obtained the property under a pre-emption decree dated the 7th August 1916.

The two points urged in this appeal have been.

1. That the burden of proving legal necessity was wrongly placed by the Court below on the defendant;

2. That even on the findings of the Court below the sale should have been maintained. The question of the burden of proof was the main issue argued in both the Courts below. The trial Court placed the burden on the plaintiff under the impression that the ruling in Sahu Ram Chandra's case. (1) required it to be so placed. The learned Additional Judge held that the trial Judge had misunderstood the passages of the ruling on which he relied and that the real effect of the ruling was in such a case as the present clearly to place the burden of proof on the defendant. In my opinion the learned Additional Judge was right. Where property has passed out of the hands of the family either in lieu of antecedent debt or under an execution sale in respect of a debt of the father the sons can only recover the property by showing that the debt was either illegal or immoral, but it is now so well established as to need no citation of authority that this rule does not apply to a sale for cash. As regards the portion of the sale price which is now in dispute the sale was a sale for cash. The sum in regard to which the Court below finds that legal necessity was not established amounts to roughly Rs. 700- out of an item of Rs. 500-taken in cash at the time of registration of the deed. The ostensible object of the loan was to pay the marriage expenses of certain members of the family. The finding of the lower appellate Court is that there was legal necessity only for a sum of Rs. 200 and that the balance of Rs.700 was taken without any necessity. There is now a long chain of authority for the view that when a transaction such as this is impeached by the sons it is for the creditor in the first instance to prove either legal necessity or at least such inquiry as would have satisfied a prudent man that the necessity existed. The appellant does not dispute this proposition where the defendant is the transferee. He urges that a different rule should be followed where the defendant is not the original transferee but a pre-emptor. The pre-emptor stands in the shoes of the original vendee. It is true that he is not himself a party to the transaction impeached, but I know of no authority, and none has been cited to me, for holding that this circumstance alone is sufficient to transfer the burden of proof from him to the sons. I hold therefore that the burden of proof has been rightly laid by the Court below.

The second issue is whether on its findings the Court below was right in setting aside the sale. The argument strenuously urged on behalf of the appellant is based on certain facts which appear in the judgment of the Court below though they are not referred to in connection with this particular issue. It appears that the whole family property consisting of an eight anna share had been usufructuarily mortgaged for 59 years at the time of the transaction. If this mortgage was not paid off within a year the right of redemption would have been finally lost. The appellant's case is that in this state of affairs the father was justified in selling a portion of the property-he actually sold a five anna share out of eight annas-in order to pay off this mortgage and recover possession of the entire property, and that even though the sale realised Rs. 700 more than were actually necessary it should be upheld. Tho criteria have been laid down in different cases for determining whether in a particular case the sale should be upheld or not.

In Jainarain Pande v. Bhagwan Pande (2) relying on the Privy Council ruling in Girdhari Lal v. Kantu Lal (3), it was said that what the Court should look, at is the amount of the consideration in regard to which no legal necessity has been established. If this amount was so trifling that it could be left out of account the sale should be upheld; otherwise it should be set aside. In one case of this Court, Balkrishna Das v. Hira Lal (4), a some what different criterion was applied. This was a case in which a sale of a house for Rs. 19,500 was upheld although the antecedent debt existing at the time amounted to Rs. 7775 only. The test here was "could the sum for which legal necessity was established have been raised without effecting the sale which was impugned". In the case in question it was held that it could not have been otherwise raised- The house sold could not have been divided up and sold piece meal, and as there was no other source from which the money could be raised the sale of the entire house was upheld by this Court If this test is applied to the present case it fails to support the appellant's contention in its entirety. The zamindari share, unlike the house in the case just cited, might have been sold piecemeal. and it is clear that if a sale of five anna share realised Rs. 2500 the amount of Rs. 1780 which had to be raised for legal necessity or antecedent debt might have been obtained by the sale of less than four annas. If there were any precedent for so doing I might be disposed to uphold the sale to such an extent as would have been necessary to raise the amount of Rs. 1780 but in the whole of the voluminous case law on this subject I can find no precedent for such a course and I am reluctant to add yet another to the complications of the existing law.

(2) 1922 All. 322—44 All. 683—20 A. L. J 621.
(3) [1837] 1 I. A. 321—14 B. L. R. 187—22 W. R. 56—3 Sar. 380 (P. C.)
(4) [1919] 41 All. 338—17 A. L J. 239—50 I. C. 74.

The appellant has sought to support his plea on the ground of benefit to the estate but this really carries him no further. The sale could only be beneficial to the estate to the extent to which it was necessary to raise the sum justified by legal necessity.

These were the only two pleas urged in the argument in chief but in replying on the case the appellant's learned counsel made some reference to a plea taken in the 4th paragraph of his memorandum of appeal to the effect that it was only necessary for the transferee to show that he made reasonable enquiries. I asked the learned counsel if he could point me to any evidence not referred to by the court below to show that such enquiries were in fact made, but he was unable to do so. Indeed neither in the trial Court where the decision was in favour of the appellant nor in the Court below where it was against him, does any point seem to have been made of the question of enquiry.

It is no doubt true, as both the Courts below have remarked, that the pre-emptor in a suit of this kind is in a difficult position. It is very doubtful if he could escape paying the full price for the property on the ground that any part of that price was not justified by legal necessity. On the other hand when he comes to defend a suit by the son he is in a much less favourable position than the original transferee by reason of the fact that he was no party to the transaction impugned and only came into the case after it was completed. It may be that he has a remedy against the original vendee for the portion of the price which he has lost on the ground that it has not been for legal necessity. As to this I can express no opinion in the present case. As the law stands the decree by the Court below was in my opinion a correct decree and I therefore dismiss the appeal. Under all the circumstances of the case it appears to me equitable to direct that the parties bear their own costs of this appeal and I direct accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

S. A. No. 746 of 1922, decided on 6th November 1923, from the decree of the S. J., Jaunpur, D/-11th January, 1922.

Civil P. C., O. 9 R. 3—Court passing an exparte decree as against some defendants can entertain application to set it aside during pendency of appeal by contesting defendants though non-contesting defendants applying under R. 13 were pro forma respondents to the appeal.

A suit was decreed against defendants No. 1-5. Defendants Nos. 1,2 and 3 only appealed to the lower appellate Court. The proceedings had been exparte against the defendants Nos. 4 and 5 and they preferred no appeal, While the appeal preferred was ponding an application was presented in the original Court on behalf of defendants 4 and 5 for setting aside the exparte decree. The Court of the first instance apparently on the ground that the defence raised by the defendants was a common one set aside the decree not only against the two defendants who had applied but against all the defendants and revived the suit, When this suit was retried by the first Court it was dismissed on the merits. An appeal was preferred by the plaintiffs to the lower appellate Court. But the plaintiffs for the first time in second appeal raised the objection that the order setting aside the exparte decree was ultra vires in as much as an appeal had been preferred from the decree that was then ponding.

Held that in as much as the appeal was still ponding the decree of the original Court was till in force and in operation; it had not been superseded by any decree on appeal or merged herein. Under these circumstances it was difficult to appreciate how on principle the view could be maintained that the jurisdiction of the original Court to entertain the application to set aside the exparte decree so far as it was exparte had been taken away.

Held further that in view of the clear wording of O 9 R. 13 the contention urged on behalf of the plaintiffs was without any force. 44 M. 731, 38 Cal. 394 and 39 A. 13 Foll. 7 A. L. J. 598 and 37 A. 258 Dist. [P. 175, C. 1]

A. Sanyal—for Appellants.

Mushtaq Ahmad with M. A. Aziz—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal arising out of a suit for possession and arrears of rent. The suit was originally decreed on the 3rd September, 1920 against defendants Nos. 1-5. On the 25th October 1920 defendants Nos. 1,2 and 3 only appealed to the lower appellate Court. The proceedings had been exparte against defendants Nos. 4 and 5 and they preferred no appeal; they were however made pro forma respondents in the appeal. While the appeal preferred on behalf of defendants 1-3 to which defendants Nos. 4 and 5 were parties, was pending, an application was presented in the original Court on behalf of defendants 4 and 5 on the 30th October 1920 for setting aside the exparte decree. Certain objections were filed by the plaintiffs on the 15th November 1920 but in these objections no plea was taken that the trial Court had no jurisdiction to set aside the decree on the ground that an appeal was already pending. On the 7th May 1921 the Court of first instance, apparently on the ground that the defence raised by the defendants was a common one, set aside the decree not only against the two defendants who had applied but against all the defendants and revived the suit. The suit having been revived the defendants who had appealed to the District Judge got a statement made through their vakil before the District Judge that there was no longer any necessity for deciding the case and that the appeal should be struck off. The order passed by the appellate Court was "appeal is dismissed according to the above statement".

When this suit was retried by the first Court it was dismissed on the merits. An appeal was preferred by the plaintiffs to the lower appellate Court; bu in the grounds of appeal again no point was taken that the order setting aside the decree was ultra vires, nor does it appear to have been argued before the lower appellate Cort as there is no reference to the point anywhere in the judgment. The appeal was dismissed on the merits, the lower appellate Court coming to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had no right to the land and had never been in possession of it.

A second appeal has been preferred on behalf of the plaintiffs and two main points have been urged on their behalf. One is that the order setting aside the exparte decree was ultra vires inasmuch as an appeal had been preferred from that decree and was then pending and the second is that the Court below has erred in interpreting the document filed by the parties.

As regards the second point there is obviously no force in it. No question of an interpretation of any document arises in this case. The lower appellate Court after considering all the documentary and oral evidence has come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have no right to the land and have never been in possession of it. The finding is one of fact and cannot be challenged.

The main contention of the plaintiffs however is that the Court of first instance had no jurisdiction to interfere with the decree which was then under appeal.

Order 9 rule 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly states that in case in which a decree is passed exparte against a defendant the latter may apply to the Court by which the decree was passed for an order to set it aside, etc. If there were no rulings to the contrary, I would have no hesitation in holding that an application under Order 9 rule 13 had to be made to the Court which passed the decree. The opinion prevailing in the various High Courts however has by no means been uniform. The view taken in the Madras High Court some time ago was certainly to the effect that the mere presentation of an appeal to an appellate Court ousts the jurisdiction of the Court of first instance. Aid appears to have been sought from S. 107 of the Code which gives to the appellate Court the same powers as are ordinarily performed by the Court of original jurisdiction. This view however was dissented from in case after case by the Calcutta High Court, where the opinion was expressed that such an application can be made only to the original Court. In one case the Calcutta High Court went even to the length to which a Bench of this Court in Gajrajmati Tiwarin v. Swami Nath Rai (1) was not prepared to go. None of the reported cases of this Court which have been brought to my notice are exactly on all fours with the present case. In the present case there are two circumstances to be noted.

1. That the appeal had not been disposed of when the first Court's decree was set saide.

2. That the applicants for setting aside the decree were parties to the appeal.

In two earlier cases namely those of Palakdhari Rai v. Mankaram Rai, (2) and Mathura Prasad v. Ram Charan Lal, (3) it was held that after the decree of the first Court had been affirmed in appeal the first Court had no jurisdiction to set it aside. These cases are distinguishable on the ground that the appeal had been disposed of and the decree of the first Court had been affirmed. On the other hand the case reported as Gajrajmati Tiwarin v. Swami Nath Rai (1) lays down that where the applicants for setting aside the decree are not made parties to the appeal, the jurisdiction of the first Court to set aside the exparte decree is not ousted. In the latter case there is an exhaustive review of the previous authorities and it is noteworthy that at pp 25 and 31 the learned Judges were inclined to the view that the opinion prevailing in the Madras High Court was not supported by any provision of the Code of Civil Procedure and was erroneous. The Madras High Court has however since wavered very much. The first case namely that of Ramanadhan Chetty v. Narayana Chetty (4) has since been overruled by a Full Bench of that High Court vide Sankara Bhatta v. Subraya Bhatta (5) and in a later case reported as Palaniappa Chetty v. Subramania Chetty (6) it has now been conceded that the mere presentation of an appeal does not necessarily take away the jurisdiction of the original Court. On the facts, that was a case clearly in point. There a decree was passed exparte against one of the defendants and an appeal against the decree was preferred by another defendant and was pending in the appellate Court when an application by the former defendant to set aside the exparte decree passed against him was made to the original Court and not to the appellate Court. It was held that such an application was not barred. I have already noted that the view prevailing in the Calcutta High Court has consistently been against the appellant. The case of Kumud Nath Roy Chowdhury v. Jotindra Nath Chowdhury (7) is a case which on the facts is very similar to the present one. That also was a case where the appeal was still pending and had not been disposed of. At page 401 the learned Judges remarked that inasmuch as the appeal was still pending the decree of the original Court was still in force and in operation; it had not been superseded by any decree on appeal or merged therein. Under those circumstances it was difficult to appreciate how on principle the view could be maintained that the jurisdiction of the original Court to entertain the application to set aside the decree in so far as it was exparte had been taken away. The view that the immediate effect of the presentation of an appeal to a superior Court is to destroy the jurisdiction of the subordinate Court to deal with the judgment was not accepted as a proposition well-founded on principle.

There is thus the authority of the Madras High Court in Palaniappa Chetty v. Subramania Chetty (6) and of the Calcutta High Court in Kumud Nath Roy Chowdhury v. Jotindra Nath Chowdhury (7) and there are observations in Gajrajmati Tiwarin v. Swami Nath Rai (1) supporting the Calcutta view. The earlier cases in Palakdhari Rai v. Mankaram Rai (2) and Mathura Prasad v. Ram Charan Lal (3) are clearly distinguishable on the ground that in those cases the appeal had been disposed of and the decree of the first Court confirmed.

In view of this state of the authorities as well as in view of the clear wording of Order 9 rule 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure I am of opinion that the contention urged on behalf of the plaintiffs appellants is without any force. The result is that this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Piggott, J.—I have considered the office report and the arguments of counsel. The cross-objections are admittedly liable to an ad valorem fee on the subject matter in dispute. This can only be ascertained by an examination of the decrees passed by the Courts below. The first Court dismissed the plaintiffs' suit: the lower appellate Court gave the plaintiff Ishdat a decree "ba qadr jaedad maliyat mubligh Rs. 100-10-0." The defendants in their petition of cross-objections ask for the restoration of the first Court's decree. I hold that the value of the subject matter in dispute on their petition of cross-objections in Rs. 100-10-0 ; they must pay an ad valorem fee on this amount. I allow them one month within which to make good the deficienoy.

Application in S. A. No. nil of 1923, Decided on 9th July 1923, from the decree of the D. J., Meerut, D/- 28th March 1923.

Limitation Act, S. 5—Negligence of client's agent is not sufficient cause.

The appeal was decided in the Court below on the 28th March. About 6 weeks later the appellant's agent went to a pleader's clerk and deposited Rs. 6 with him to obtain copies. No instructions were given to the pleader himself. A week later the subordinate Courts closed for thirty days for the vacation. The copies were not applied for till 27th June, a week after the Courts reopened, and were obtained on July 3. Even then the Copy of the judgment of the trial Court was not applied for and this was obtained between July 3 and July 5.

Held, that no sufficient cause was proved so as to admit the appeal beyond time. [P.176, C. 2]

N. C. Vaish—for Appellant.

Daniels, J.—This is an application for admission under S. 5 of the Limitation Act of an appeal which was filed on the 6th July, three days beyond time. As the reasons given by the defendant appeared to me on the face of them insufficient I have heard appellant's counsel in support of the application. He has failed to satisfy me that the application should be allowed.

The appeal was decided in the Court below on the 28th March. About six weeks later, according to the facts stated in the affidavit, the appellant's agent went to a pleader's clerk and deposited Rs. 6/- with him to obtain copies. He does not say that he gave any instructions to the pleader himself. A week later the Subordinate Courts closed for thirty days for the vacation. Copies were not applied for till 27th June, a week after the Courts reopened, and were obtained on July 3. Even then the copy of the judgment of the trial Court was not applied for and this was obtained between July 3 and July 5.

This is not a case of an appeal being filed too late or in the wrong Court owing to a bona fide mistake of law or to wrong advice given by a pleader. It is a case of gross negligence on the part of the defendant's agent and of the pleader's clerk whom the latter employed to get the copies for him. A pleader's clerk in this country is not a person to whom obtaining of copies could be safely left without any supervision. The defendant through her agent appears to have taken no steps to find out whether the copies had been obtained until almost the very day that limitation would in the ordinary course expire. Even if the negligence was that of the pleader himself it would make no difference. As Mr. Rustomji says on page 43 of his Limitation Act of 1922 (3rd edition) "Negligence of counsel or solicitor stands on the same footing as that of any other person and a negligence by him is not sufficient cause." A somewhat similar case to to the present is that of Budhu v. Diwan (1) decided in Letters Patent Appeal. There a fee and some papers were left with a legal practitioner in order to file an appeal. He failed to file it and returned the papers to the client after the period of limitation had expired. It was held that this was not a sufficient ground for admitting the appeal beyond time under S. 5. Even the case on which the appellant chiefly relies, Nicholas v. Asphar (2) is really against him. The words on which he relies are that the expression "sufficient cause" should receive a liberal construction when no negligence or inaction or want of bona fides is imputable to the appellant.

In my opinion the ground alleged for admitting the appeal beyond time in this case is inadequate and I therefore reject the appeal as time barred.

Appeal dismissed.

SULAIMAN, J.

East Indian Railway Co.—Applicant.

v.

Messrs. Sri Ram Mahadeo—Opposite party.

Civ. Rev. Case decided on 13th November, 1923, from the order of the Small Cause Court Judge, Cawnpore, dated the 27th August, 1923.

Railways Act, S. 72—Risk Note B—Proof of wilful neglect was held sufficient from circumstances.

The plaintiff was the consignee of 126 bags which were loaded at Kidderpur station and were despatched to Cawnpore. The wagon admittedly arrived at Cawnpore and the seals on the wagon were found intact. As the Railway Company had many other wagons to unload, this wagon was put on a siding and remained there for two days when it was reported that the seals on one side of the wagon were broken. When the contents were checked it was discovered that six bags were missing. After a lengthy correspondence which came to nothing the plaintiff instituted the present suit to recover damages for the loss of the bags. It was found on evidence that the yard where the wagon was kept was a very large one and that its wall on the jungle side was broken at several places at the time when the goods were stolen.

Held that though ordinarily the neglect or theft has to be proved by the plaintiff, in this case it has sufficiently been proved and therefore the Railway is liable. (39 All. 418, Expl.) [P. 177, Cs. 1 & 2; P. 178, C. 1.]

L. P. Zutshi—for the Applicant.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is an application in revision arising out of a Small Cause Court matter. The plaintiff was the consignee of 126 bags, which were loaded at Kidderpur station and were despatched to Cawnpore. The wagon admittedly arrived at Cawnpore on the 27th of December, 1921, and the seals on the wagon were found intact. As the railway company had many other wagons to unload this wagon was put on a siding and remained there for two days. On the 29th of December it was reported that the seals on one side of the wagon were broken. When the contents were checked it was discovered that six bags were missing. After a lengthy correspondence which came to nothing, the plaintiff instituted the present suit to recover damages for the loss of the bags.

The railway company took several pleas in defence, but three main issues were framed by the trial court. The first was whether the risk note absolved the defendant company of all liability or not. The second was whether the goods were stolen at Cawnpore yard and whether the risk note (Form B) applied and whether the defendant company was guilty of wilful negligence or not. And the third was to what money the plaintiff was entitled.

The learned Judge of the Small Cause Court found these issues in favour of the plaintiff and granted him a decree. The defendant company has come up in revision, and on its behalf it is urged that the findings of the lower court are quite insufficient, and further that the burden lay on the plaintiff to prove that there was either a wilful neglect of the company or theft by or on account of the wilful neglect of its servants.

I am bound to concede that under the contract which took the shape of the risk-note (Form B) a prima facie burden lay on the plaintiff to prove neglect or theft of the kind mentioned therein. I agree that a mere proof of the loss of the goods would not be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a decree. This was the view expressed by a Beach of this Court in the case of E. I. Ry. Co. v. Nathmal Behari Lal (1) and the same view has prevailed in other High Courts also. I do not however take that rule to mean that in no case can the burden of proof be shifted to the defendant. It is obvious that the evidence, if any, of wilful neglect or negligence is within the special means of knowledge of the railway company, and it is ordinarily very difficult for a plaintiff to establish that the loss was due to the wilful neglect of the company. Nevertheless, I concede that under the terms of the contract the burden is prima facie on the consignee. But I am of opinion that where certain circumstances have been established, either by direct evidence produced by the plaintiff or by the cross-examination of the witnesses for the defendant, from which circumstances wilful neglect or negligence can be inferred, the burden must then be shifted to the defendant company. Such circumstances coupled with the patent fact that the packages have been lost, may justify a court to hold that the burden has been discharged.

As to the case of E. I. Ry. Co. v. Nathmal Behari Lal (1) referred to above, it is to be noted that the only circumstance which the plaintiff had there proved was the fact that the goods had been despatched and on arrival of the train in Cawnpore the seals of the doors of five wagons were found to have been broken and six bags of sugar found missing. The learned Judges were doubtful whether it was not a case of theft from a running train.

In the recent case decided by the House of Lords, namely, H. O. Smith, Ld. v. Great Western Railway Company (2) it was laid down that the burden of proving in the first instance that the loss sustained arose from the wilful misconduct of the company's servants was thrown upon the trader. In that case also all that the plaintiff was able to show, as will appear from the remarks on that page, was that he had proved the delivery of the goods to the railway company's servants, and he put in evidence subsequent correspondence between himself and the railway company which suggested that the company was very reluctant to supply information to the plaintiff. On behalf of the plaintiff it was urged by his Counsel that the wilful misconduct on the part of the company's servants must be inferred from the subsequent correspondence. Their Lordships did not accept that contention, and found that the burden of proving wilful neglect had not been discharged.

In the present case I find that the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court had before him a clear issue as to the wilful negligence of the company. In the course of his judgment he has pointed out that the yard where the wagon was kept was a very large one and that its wall on the jungle side was broken at several places at the time when the goods were stolen. He has also commented on the fact that the railway company took two days to unload the goods after their arrival at the station. Having considered these circumstances he remarks: "If the goods are lost on account of the railway company's not making proper arrangements the railway company is liable". Further on he remarks that it was clearly not a case of theft from a running train. In view of these findings I am unable to hold that the judgment of the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court is wrong. There were certain circumstances before him from which it was open to him to infer that proper arrangements had not been made by the railway company, and that therefore there was a wilful neglect. He was entitled therefore to hold that the burden had been discharged. In view of this I am unable to interfere. The application is rejected.

Revision rejected.

WALSH AND RYVES, JJ.

Ram Chand and others—Plaintiffs.

v.

Maula Baksh and others—Defendants.

F. A. F. O. No. 45 of 1923, decided on 20th October, 1923, from the order of the Subordinate Judge, Muttra, dated 7th December, 1922.

Civ. Pro. Code, S. 11, Expl. 6—Though persons suing in public right in the prior suit are different from persons, suing in public right in the latter suit but the suits relate to the same subject the parties are same and not different.

There is in the Muhalla Taksalyan in Muttra a well. There is a mosque adjoining thereto. The word "well" in this connection includes of course the Chabutra and also certain strips of land adjoining the Chabutra and appurtenant to the well. Some time back the trustees of the mosque came into collision with the Municipal Board about this well. They applied to the Municipal Board for a certain sanction under the Municipalities Act and were refused. They then brought a suit asserting that the well was the property of the mosque in which they joined the Municipal Board as defendant and in which certain other persons, Banias of the Mohalla, applied for and were granted permission to join as defendants in defence of the alleged public property in the well. That suit was tried out and it was held that the trustees of the mosque had failed to prove their title to the well, that the well was a public one and that the trustees of the mosque had no right to enclose it.

Fifteen years later the trustees erected what they politely call a room but what is really a structure in which no body is ever likely to sit or was ever intended to sit but which represents in the shape of a wall an obstruction to the public use of the well, in defiance of the previous decision and as a challenge to the public. Possibly the complexion of the Municipal Board had changed in the interval and they did not sue for the removal of that construction and therefore plaintiffs being residents in the Mohalla interested in the well if it is a public one, properly obtained the sanction of the Legal Remembrancer to bring a suit under S. 91 for the removal of the interference with their public right.

Held that applying explanation 6 to this case it is quite clear that the present plaintiffs are claiming under the persons who bona fide litigated in respect of a public right in the first suit, and therefore no issue can be raised in this suit as to whether or not this well and its appurtenances are public property. [P. 180, C. 1.]

N. Asthana—for the Appellants.

Gulzari Lal—for the Respondents.

Walsh, J.:—We find ourselves unable to agree with the view which the District Judge has taken in this particular matter. The point in dispute is a small one and we think the law is really quite clear. It is probable that the true legal considerations were not pointed out to the learned Judge in the argument. There is in the Muhalla Taksalyan in Muttra a well which has become the subject of much litigation. There is a mosque adjoining thereto and the trustees of the mosque, who are of course Muhammadans, have been from time to time asserting a right of private ownership over this well. When the word 'well' is used in this connection it includes of course the chabutra and also certain strips of land adjoining the chabutra and appurtenant to the well in the same way that when a man speaks of his house he includes the compound and the gate although they are no part of the house. Sometime back the trustees of the mosque came into collision with the Municipal Board about this well. They applied to the Municipal Board for a certain sanction under the Municipalities Act and were refused. They then brought a suit asserting that the well was the property of the mosque in which they joined the Municipal Board as defendants and in which certain other persons, Banias of the Mohalla, applied for and were granted permission to join as defendants in defence of the alleged public property in the well. That suit was tried out and it was held that the trustees of the mosque had failed to prove their title to the well, that the well was a public one and that the trustees of the mosque had no right to enclose it. Fifteen years have passed since that decision and the trustees of the mosque, having regard to their present assertions are entitled to some credit for having sat down patiently under that decision for so long; but whether times have changed, or whether the trustees regard 15 years as a period longer than is reasonable to expect judicial consistency, they have recently erected what they politely call a room but what is really a structure in which nobody is ever likely to sit or was ever intended to sit, but which represents in the shape of a wall an obstruction to the public use of the well. This was no doubt done in defiance of the previous decision and as a challenge to the public. Possibly the complexion of the Municipal Board has changed in the interval. It would have been possible for the Municipal Board representing the public to have brought a suit for the removal of that construction. By section 55 of the Act of 1900, and by the corresponding section of the Act of 1916 all public wells in Muttra are vested in the Municipal Board, but they did not, and the present plaintiffs being residents in the Mohalla interested in the well if it is a public one, properly obtained the sanction of the Legal Remembrancer to bring a suit under section 91 for the removal of this interference with their public right. The Municipal Board of course represents the public in such matters as wells and other things which are vested in them, but the refusal of the Municipal Board, or the negligence of the Municipal Board to assert a public right, does not affect the existence of the public right, and the plaintiffs had a perfect right to sue in assertion of their public right if they could get the necessary authority required by the legislature for bringing such a suit. So stated it would seem perfectly obvious and a mere matter of common sense apart from any legal considerations that the only question was whether the construction put up by the trustees of the mosque was an interference with the public well or with the public enjoyment thereof. Nobody could reasonally suppose that it was open to the trustees in any suit brought by persons representing the public to question the point which has already been decided against them. Probably on this ground no evidence was taken in the court below and the Munsif came to the conclusion that the previous decision bound the defendants, that the construction which the defendants erected amounted to an encroachment and made an order accordingly for its removal. The defendants appealed upon the ground that the matter was not res judicata, and the District Judge probably overlooking the provisions of section 11, explanation 6, to which we will refer in a moment, has come to the conclusion that the suit is not between the same parties. The view he probably took was that by section 41 of the Evidence Act the previous judgment was not a judgment in rem within the meaning of section 41, but that it was merely a matter which was to be taken into consideration within the meaning of section 42 of the Indian Evidence Act. He actually says that the issues and the principal parties are different. In one sense they are, but where we differ from him is that in our opinion in the legal sense they are the same. Mr. Gulzari Lal for the trustees of the mosque suggested that the question is this suit related to certain triangular insignificant piece of land which was outside the well and outside the previous dispute. That point was certainly not clearly stated by the defendants in their written statement but it is a question of fact as to whether or not it appertains to the well. The suit was brought in relation to the obstruction which had been erected on this triangular piece of land on the allegation that the piece appertained to the well. It has not been seriously disputed that it does and of course if it does the triangular piece was substantially decided even though the word used in the former judgment was 'well'. With regards to the parties that is not a question of fact but a question of law. The persons are undoubtedly not the same nor is the form under which they appear on the record but the Municipal Board in the previous suit represented the public. The Banias who asked to be joined could not have done so except upon a bona fide assertion of an interest in the public right and as they were defendants in the suit brought by the trustees there can be no doubt that they were bona fide litigating in respect of a public right which they were defending. Section 11 forbids any court to try an issue which has been substantially in issue in a former suit between the parties under whom they claim. As a matter of fact the section is entirely ungrammatical in this respect but it must mean the parties to the subsequent suit claiming under parties to the prior suit and applying explanation 6 to this case, it is quite clear that the present plaintiffs are claiming under the persons who bona fide litigated in respect of a public right in the first suit. The result is that section 11 applies and that no issue can be raised in this suit as to whether or not this well and its appurtenances are public property. There being nothing else left in the suit the appeal must be allowed and the judgment and decree of the Munsif restored with costs here and below.

We suggest that if the parties are desirous of arriving at a final agreement which will bind them and their successors for all time as to the actual dimensions of this public well the best plan would be for them, if they are agreeable thereto, to apply to the Munsif under this decree to make a further addition thereto. Of course he cannot do so without their consent but with their consent there will be no difficulty whatever, and on such application the Munsif either by going there himself or by sending his amin, could demarcate the land itself, have a photo taken or by measurement have a plan prepared and affixed to this decree finally showing in a clear picture the dimensions of the land appertaining to the well. If any attempt to do this is made or any difficulty occurs reference may be made to this Bench, but we do not wish the Munsif to understand that he is compelled to do anything if he is not disposed to do so.

Appeal allowed.

Where a matter in a pleading is merely stated to be "not admitted" in the written statement it cannot be deemed to be admitted, for it is at least denied by implication. The punctuations in r. 5 however do appear to mean the contrary. [P. 182, C. 2.]

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a revision from an order of the Court of Small Causes.

The plaintiff firm despatched 57 bundles of cotton weighing 63 maunds and 2 seers from Balrampur station which is on the B. N. W. Railway to the Agra Fort on the B.B. and C.I. Railway. According to the allegations in the plaint the staff of the defendant company when asked, gave out the rate of freight on cotton to be Rs. 1-8 per maund and it was on this understanding that the plaintiff despatched the goods from Balrampur to Agra Fort under the Railway receipt No. 9937, dated the 19th of September, 1921. The plaintiff goes on to allege that, though the actual weight of the goods despatched was 63 maunds, the staff of the Railway Company illegally and unjustifiably charged Rs. 223-2 for 108 maunds, and that the extra amount was paid by the plaintiff under protest which he is entitled to recover from the defendant. The written statement which was filed by the defendant company was very vague and somewhat evasive. Referring to the allegation of the plaintiff that the staff of the defendant company when asked had given out that the rate of freight on cotton would be Rs. 1-8 per maund and that it was on this understanding that the plaintiff despatched the goods, the written statement merely stated "not admitted". The defendant company however went on to plead that out of the consignment of 57 bundles some were loaded in one wagon, which left no room for the remaining commodity to be loaded in, that under paragraph 6 of the instructions printed as notice to the consignors on the back of the railway receipt and forwarding note form, the company reserved the right of re-weighment, re-measurement and re-calculation of freight, and that the charges were correctly recovered. The learned Judge of the court below in his judgment appears to have accepted the plaintiff's case that the railway authorities realised the extra amount at the destination. The learned Judge accepted the statement of the loading clerk to the effect that after loading 52 bundles of cotton no place was left for loading any more goods. It was the defendant's case as disclosed by the loading clerk's evidence that as these articles were bulky they could not be loaded in one four-wheeled wagon and that these bundles were despatched in a bogie carriage, i. e., an eight-wheeler. The learned Judge however overruled the defence on the ground that it had not been shown on behalf of the defendant that the 52 bundles in question could not be loaded in a four-wheeled wagon. This is not quite consistent with the remark previously made as to the statement of the loading clerk. The facts as alleged by the defendant company seem to be that the bundles of cotton were so bulky that they could not all be loaded in one small wagon.

There can be no doubt that under rule 59 of the General Rules when goods tendered for conveyance are of such description that owing to their bulk, measurement, or other cause, it is found impossible to load each broad-gauge wagon to the extent of 120 maunds, and metre or narrow-gauge wagon 81 maunds, such goods will be subject to a minimum charge of 120 and 81 maunds respectively, per wagon, unless any special exception is noted. The above charges are based on four-wheeled wagons. Should the conditions of the consignment involve the use of larger vehicles, the charges will be increased in the proportion of one bogie carriage for two vehicles.

57 bundles of cotton weighed about 52 maunds. If it is a fact that all the 57 bundles could not be loaded in one four-wheeled wagon it is patent that owing to their bulk it is impossible to load 81 maunds of goods in a narrow-gauge wagon. Under rule 58 therefore it is clear that the defendant company was entitled to charge at the minimum rate of 81 maunds per wagon. If the goods were carried in two small four-wheelers or in one bogie carriage then the company was entitled to charge for 162 maunds.

The learned Judge seems to have drawn a distinction between 'bulky goods' and 'goods in bulk'. The expression 'goods in bulk' does not find place in rule 59 at all and its true meaning is altogether irrelevant. There can be no doubt that the bundles of cotton were bulky and it was in consequence of their bulk that 81 maunds of the goods could not be loaded in one small wagon. The railway company was certainly entitled to charge at the minimum rate of 81 maunds per wagon. In this view of the matter the decree of the learned Judge of the Court of Small Causes would not be quite correct.

The learned Vakil for the plaintiff-respondent however supports the decree of the Court below on a different ground. His case is that according to the allegations in the plaint which were not expressly denied by the defendant and which have been assumed to be correct by the learned Judge of the court below, there was an express agreement between the plaintiff and the railway company to carry the goods at the maund rate, and therefore it is not now open to the company to alter the terms of the contract and demand a charge on the basis of wagon rate. The railway company in their written statement themselves referred to paragraph No. 6 printed on the back of the railway receipt which was to the effect that they had reserved a right of re-weighment, re-measurement and re-calculation of freight, etc. This clearly implies that there was a re-calculation and the extra charge was found recoverable on the re-calculation. As I have already noted there was no express denial of the plaintiff's allegation that an assurance had originally been given by the railway authorities that the goods would be carried at the maund rate.

If there was an original contract to carry the goods according to the maund rate then it is clear that the defendant company would not be entitled to alter that agreement. The rule on which the defendant relied is quite similar to the rule which was under consideration in the Full Bench case of Chunni Lal v. The Nizam's Guaranteed State Railway Company, Ld. (1). A similar point arose in the case of Alla-uddin v. The G.I.P. Railway Company (2). At page 232 of the Full Bench case cited above, it was pointed out that a rule of this kind reserving the railway company's right of re-measurement, re-weighment, re-calculation and re-classification of rates, terminal and other charges at the place of destination did not give the railway company power to alter the contract between the parties and charge maund rate in lieu of wagon rate. The second case mentioned by me was a case where the railway company wanted to alter the maund rate into wagon rate and their right to do so under the General Rules was negatived. In view of these pronouncements it is clear that if the original contract between the parties was that the goods should be carried according to the maund rate it would not be open to the defendant company to alter that contract and charge according to the wagon rate.

The learned Vakil for the applicants in rejoinder has urged that the defendant company did not admit that there was any such original contract, nor did they admit that the extra amount charged at the destination was based on an alteration of the rates.

The plaintiff did not go into the witness-box nor did he produce any evidence. The railway company which presumably is in possession of the railway receipt and the forwarding note has also withheld them. The evidence on the point therefore is very meagre.

It is contended on behalf of the respondent that under Order 8, rule 5 if a matter is not denied specifically or denied by necessary implication or if it is merely stated to be 'not admitted' in the written statement it should be taken to have been admitted. Reference is made to certain old English cases where pleadings were strictly construed, as the rules of pleadings in England are very stringent. One would have thought that where a matter is expressly stated to be "not admitted", it cannot be deemed to be admitted, for it is at least denied by implication. The punctuations in rule 5 however do appear to support the contention of the learned Vakil for the respondent, but I do not propose to go into this matter in any further detail, because there is a proviso to that rule which says that the court may in its discretion require any fact so admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admission. Under this proviso therefore even if there be an implied admission by the defendant the court can require evidence to prove it.

Having read the pleadings I am of opinion that the question of there having been an express contract to carry the goods according to the maund rate has not been properly tried by the court below. If there really was such a contract then on the rulings referred to by me the defendant cannot charge wagon rate in lieu of maund rate. On the other hand if there was no such contract at all and the railway company had originally charged at the wagon rate but there was a miscalculation in the amount charged, then certainly it would be open to the railway company to recover the balance.

(2) (1916) 14 A.L.J. 494=34 I.C. 104.

I therefore allow the application and setting aside the decree of the court below remand the case to that court for disposal according to law. The parties will be at liberty to produce fresh relevant evidence if they think necessary. As the whole trouble has been caused by the vagueness in the defendant's pleading I direct that the parties should bear their own costs in this Court. The costs in the trial court should abide the event.

Case remanded.

Daniels, J. :—This is an application in revision asking this Court to make, under section 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, an order for the restoration of property, which the trial court has refused to make. The discretion to pass or not to pass such an order is very clearly vested in the trial court by the section, which says that the court may pass such an order if it thinks fit. I know of no case in which a court of appeal or revision has compelled a court to pass such an order in a case in which, in the exercise of its discretion, it has declined to do so. Indeed there is the authority of two High Courts, those of Calcutta and the Punjab, for the view that a court of appeal or revision has no power to do so. This was held by the Calcutta High Court in the case of Bhagabat Shaha v. Sadique Ostagar (1), and by the Punjab High Court in Muhammad Din v. The Crown (2). Even if this Court in revision has power to pass the order applied for, there are no such exceptional circumstances in this case as would justify such action. I dismiss the application.

In pursuance of an execution proceeding instituted by the decree-holder against Mt. Mahmud Bano the widow and legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor for the realisation of the decretal amount by the attachment and sale of certain property, three houses were attached as the property of the deceased judgment-debtor. Mt. Mahmud Bano filed an objection that she held the house in question as a Mutwalli under a deed of endowment executed by her and her husband ;

Judgment :—This appeal arises out of an execution proceeding instituted by the decree-holder-appellant against Musammat Mahmud Bano, the widow and legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor, for the realisation of the decretal money by the attachment and sale of certain property. In pursuance of his application three houses were attached as the property of the deceased judgment-debtor. Musammat Mahmud Bano filed an objection that she held the houses in question as a mutwalli under a deed of endowment executed by her and her husband on the 7th of May 1911. The court of first instance treated the objection as one under section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and after examining the evidence adduced in the case came to the conclusion that the deed of wakf in question had not been carried into effect and was not a genuine transaction. It further held that Musammat Mahmud Bano was not in possession of the houses in dispute as a mutwalli but she was in possession as the heir of her husband. From that decision there was an appeal to the District Judge which was allowed without any question being raised or considered as to whether such an appeal was maintainable under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is urged here on behalf of the decree-holder-appellant that no appeal lay to the District Judge because the capacity in which Musammat Mahmud Bano was claiming the release of the property in dispute from attachment was different from the capacity in which she had been impleaded as a party to the execution proceeding. Order 21, rule 58 of the Code deals with objections which involve the determination of the question whether the property attached is liable to such attachment or not. A person who has been impleaded as a party to a decree or to an execution proceeding as the heir of a deceased debtor is a party to such decree or proceeding. If such a person claims to be in possession of the property attached not in his or her own right or in his or her right as a legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor but claims to be so in possession in his or her capacity as a mutwalli of an endowment, the objection can be considered under Order 21, rule 60 of the Code; but subject to the result of a suit under Order 21, rule 63, the order passed thereon is conclusive. Section 47 contemplates questions relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of a decree between the parties to a suit or their representatives. A person who claims certain property as a mutwalli of a trust is not a representative of judgment-debtor, though the author of the trust may have been the judgment-debtor himself, except where such trust is created after the suit or the decree passed therein.

In Nathmul Das v. Tajammul Husain (1) where a judgment-debtor upon the attachment of certain land in execution of a decree passed against him personally by the Revenue Court instituted a suit for a declaration and establishment of his right to such land, not as his own property but as wakf, of which he claimed to be mutwalli or trustee, it was held that inasmuch as plaintiff was not suing in his own right but in his capacity as custodian, trustee or manager of the wakf property, he must be deemed to fill a character separate from that in which the decree in question was passed against him and section 244 of the old Code of Civil Procedure was inapplicable.

In Ramnathan Chettiar v. Levvai Marakayar (2) it was similarly held that a person claiming certain property alleged to have been set apart for charitable purposes as a trustee puts forward a claim which cannot be determined in a subsequent proceeding because the court has in such cases to look to the substance of the objection and not to the claim that is put forward by one person rather than another. A person claiming a property under a trust made by a third person is not a representative of a party to the suit any more than a person claiming the property as a personal property when the decree passed against him charges him with liability as a trustee or in a representative character. And it would make no difference if the trust was created by the judgment-debtor himself prior to the execution of the suit which result in such a decree.

In Kartick Chandra Ghose v. Ashutosh Dhara (3) an objection by a judgment-debtor or his representative to the attachment or sale of certain property on the ground that he held the same in trust for some third person or a charitable institution was similarly held to be excluded from the operation of section 244 of the old Code of Civil Procedure.

It is urged on behalf of the judgment-debtor-respondent that the real question for determination in the present case is whether certain property forms a part of the assets of the deceased judgment-debtor. That is an aspect which presents itself in every case in which an objection to the attachment of any property, whether it is made by a third person or by the legal representative of the deceased debtor. The capacity in which the claimant seeks to have the attachment removed, however, determines the remedy, which is further open to him, if the objection is decided against him, or if the objector claims the said property as a trustee for a third person or a charitable institution, the claimant is not really a judgment-debtor or his legal representative but he represents such third person or charitable institution.

(1) (1884) 7 All. 36=(1884) A.W.N. 218.
(2) (1900) 23 Mad. 195=10 M.L.J. 64 (F.B.).
(3) (1912) 39 Cal. 298=16 C.W.N. 26=14 C.L.J. 425=12 I.C. 163 (F.B.).

It is also urged that if no appeal lay to the Court below, no appeal would similarly lie here from the decree passed by that Court, but if the Court below assumed jurisdiction and passed a decree such a decree is as much open to a second appeal as a decree passed in a suit by a Court which has no jurisdiction to entertain that suit.

In Jwala Prasad v. Salig Ram (4) which was followed in Wilayat Husain v. Ram Lal (5) it was held that where a Court of first appeal entertained an appeal in a case in which no appeal lay to that Court, a second appeal would lie to this Court from the order or decree passed in such an appeal.

In Bandiram Mookerjee v. Poorna Chandra Roy (6) a similar view was taken. It is true that the decree-holder-appellant raised no such objection in the lower appellate Court, but where a question of jurisdiction is involved, he is not estopped from raising that objection here.

The appeal is therefore allowed and the order of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored with costs here and in the lower appellate Court.

Appeal allowed.

Criminal Reference No. 184 of 1923, decided on 29th March, 1923, made by 1st Addl. Sessions Judge, Gorakhpur.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 556—Magistrate being a witness to the identification proceedings is no ground for commitment.

Where the Magistrate, who committed the accused, was himself a Magistrate of the first class, but passed an order of commitment on the ground that he was a witness of the identification proceedings in the case:

Held, that the proper course for him, was to have moved the District Magistrate (17 A.L.J. 456, Foll.) [P. 185, C. 1.]

REFERRING ORDER:—I am afraid the order of commitment in this case is bad in law. The accused Ramjatan Ahir, an old man of 50, has been sent up on a charge under section 394 of the Indian Penal Code. The case against him is that he robbed Musammat Sitabjan, a prostitute by profession, on the evening of 7th December, 1922, after dark as after getting down from the Railway Station she was going to a village accompanied by one Gharbharan, and after beating both of them carried away from her person a hansuli, a bali and an alwan. The charge is one that was triable by a Magistrate of 1st class, Presidency Magistrate or Court of Sessions. The learned Magistrate, Mr. B. V. Bhadkamkar, I.C.S., who committed the accused, is himself a Magistrate of the first class. In his order of commitment he says, "Though the case is of a petty nature, I am committing accused to the Sessions as I am myself a witness of the identification proceedings." This is the only reason he gives for adopting that course. He does not say that the offence committed was one which, in his opinion, he could not adequately punish. On the other hand, he regarded the crime "of a petty nature" and as such within his competence to pass an adequate sentence. As the case was triable by the learned Magistrate, I think he should have proceeded under section 254, Criminal Procedure Code, which provides that in a case which he is competent to try, if a Magistrate thinks he could adequately punish, he shall frame a charge and proceed with the trial, and he should have committed to Sessions only in case he considered that he could not pass an adequate sentence which in this case he evidently did not think. In any case, he does not express his opinion to that effect. If he felt that by reason of his being a witness in the case he should not himself try it the proper course for him, I think, was to have moved the District Magistrate to transfer it to some other Magistrate, competent to try it and subordinate to him. The ruling in Emperor v. Bindeshri Goshain (1) seems to me in point and governs this case. I, therefore, refer the matter to the Hon'ble High Court with a recommendation that the commitment may be quashed."

Ryves, J.:—I agree with the reasons given by the learned Sessions Judge and quash the commitment to sessions. I send the case back to the District Magistrate of Gorakhpur, who will depute a Magistrate competent to try it other than Mr. Bhadkamkar. Let the papers be returned.

Judgment:—This is an application in revision against the conviction of the applicants under section 4 of the Gambling Act. The police made a raid on the house of one Surja, as gaming was going on. The accused were found present and instruments of gaming were found. The warrant had been duly obtained, the presumption contained in section 6 of the Gambling Act therefore applied. It has been suggested on the authority of the case of Lachchi Ram v. Emperor (1) that it was necessary for the police to give direct evidence that the gambling was being carried on for the profit of the keeper of the house. I have examined that judgment and find that it contains no reference to section 6. Here the presumption contained in that section was clearly applicable and dispensed with the necessity of direct evidence that a commission was being taken by the keeper of the house. The revision accordingly fails and I dismiss it.

Evidence Act, S. 105—Penal Code, S. 84—Plea of insanity to be proved by the accused.

Where the evidence as to the insanity of accused is conflicting, the accused should be convicted as on him lies the burden of proving insanity which in the case of conflicting evidence cannot be said to be sufficiently discharged.

S. A. Hyder—for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Daniels, J.:—This a somewhat curious case. The applicant committed an assault on the wife of a Civil Surgeon and was sentenced to nine months' rigorous imprisonment. The defence of insanity was raised at the trial. The medical evidence regarding the accused was conflicting. One doctor thought him insane, but on the other hand the Superintendent of the Bareilly Lunatic Asylum, under whose supervision he was placed, reported and gave evidence that he was not insane. Under these circumstances the learned Sessions Judge says that if the burden of proving affirmatively the man's unsoundness of mind had been on the prosecution he would say that it had not been discharged, but insanity being of a nature of a general exception which must be proved by the accused, he was of opinion that the defence had failed to prove insanity. This is a correct statement of the law and in view of the evidence of the Superintendent of the Lunatic Asylum I do not think that it can be challenged on the evidence. I may add that the case was again reported to Government by the Sessions Judge for such action as Government might take and Government has since returned the record stating that it is advised that the man is not insane. Under the circumstances I do not see my way to interfere with the order passed by the Court below.

I accordingly dismiss the application.

Crim. Rev. No. 316 of 1923, decided on 13th July, 1923 against the order of the District Magistrate, Farrukhabad, dated the 21st May, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 195—Penal Code, S. 182—Sanction not necessary where false report is made to the police though subsequently same complaint is also made to the Court.

Where a false charge is made to the police and not to a Court no sanction is required. The accused's having subsequently made a complaint in Court is no bar to the Court's proceeding with the trial of the offence under S. 182, I.P.C., without sanction. (17 A.L.J. 32, Foll.) [P. 187, C. 2.]

A. Dube—for the Applicant.

The Asst. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Daniels, J.:—This is an application for revision of an order of the District Magistrate directing the trial court to proceed with the trial of the accused under section 182, I.P.C. It appears that the applicant made a report to the police which was alleged to be false and sanction for his prosecution under section 182, I.P.C., was duly granted. The applicant was put on his trial before a Magistrate of the second class. This Magistrate being of opinion that the evidence disclosed an offence under section 211, I.P.C., which he was incompetent to try submitted the proceedings to the Sub-Divisional Officer under section 349, Cr.P.C. This officer framed a charge under section 211, I.P.C., but after the hearing of the case was complete came to the conclusion that he could not try the accused on this charge for want of previous sanction by the court. He therefore sent a report to the Magistrate suggesting that the case should be referred to the High Court under section 435, Cr. P. C., with a view that the whole proceedings be quashed. The District Magistrate declined to make a reference holding that whether sanction to the charge under section 211, I.P.C., was required or not the accused could certainly be tried for an offence under section 182, I.P.C., for which he was originally placed on trial and directed the trying Magistrate to proceed with the case. Against this order the applicant has come in revision to this Court.

Where a false charge is made to the Police and not to a Court a perusal of section 195, Cr. P. C., makes it clear that no sanction is required. The Calcutta High Court has however held in a series of cases of which it is sufficient to mention the case of Tayebulla v. Emperor (1) and Brown v. Ananda Lal Mullick (2) that where an accused person has gone on to prefer a complaint in court his accusation to the Police must be held to have been made in relation to the proceedings in court subsequently instituted and that sanction is therefore necessary. A Bench of this Court in Emperor v. Hardwar Pal (3) was inclined to the same view. Now in this case the accused did subsequently make a complaint in court which was dismissed, though the present prosecution has not been based on that complaint but, as a perusal of the charge-sheet shows, on the original report made at the Police station on 1st September last. The present case is however almost exactly covered by the decision in Mula v. Emperor (4). There also the accused was charged in the first instance under section 182, I.P.C., before a Magistrate of the second class. That Magistrate returned the record to the District Magistrate on the ground that the accused had committed an offence under section 211, I.P.C., which he was not authorised to try. The District Magistrate, as in this case, directed the trial to proceed. This Court in revision upheld the order on the ground that the accused's having subsequently made a complaint in court was no bar to the court's proceeding with the trial of the offence under section 182, I.P.C. It is interesting to note that the Judge who decided this case was one of the Judges who had previously decided the case of Emperor v. Hardwar Pal (3). In this case the facts alleged by the prosecution, whether they amount to an offence under section 211, I.P.C., or not, undoubtedly constitute an offence under section 182, I.P.C. It was in respect of this offence that the present trial was commenced. In my opinion no useful purpose would beserved by quashing the present proceedings and requiring the accused to be put on his trial afresh after all the evidence has been recorded.

There is one further objection which it is necessary to notice. The complaint which the accused filed in Court was rejected on a Police report without his being given an opportunity to produce his witnesses. This is contrary to the rulings of this Court, but any objection on this score should have been taken at an earlier stage and not when the trial of the accused is practically concluded.

For the above reasons I dismiss the present application.

Crim. Rev. No. 327 of 1923, decided on 13th July, 1923, against the order of the Sessions Judge, Budaun, dated the 12th May, 1923.

U. P. Municipalities Act, S. 85 (1)—Striking work after notice is an offence.

On 10th April ten sweepers sent a notice to the Municipal Board demanding an increase of pay. Having received no reply to this they on 20th April sent a further notice threatening to strike on 1st May unless their demands were granted. On 1st May they abandoned their work in accordance with the notice. The Magistrate examined the Health Officer in the case of one of these and the latter stated that there was the danger of Cholera epidemic.

Held, that they were rightly convicted under S. 85 (1). [P. 188, C. 2.]

The Asst. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Daniels, J.:—These are ten applications in revision by ten sweepers who have been convicted under section 85 (1) of the U.P. Municipalities Act and sentenced to two months' rigorous imprisonment. That section renders a Municipal sweeper who resigns or abandons his employment without the permission of the Board liable to two months' imprisonment. The section is a very drastic one and requires to be very carefully worked. It was obviously enacted to meet the grave public danger which may arise from a sudden strike of sweepers in a town. In this case there is no question whatsoever that the action of the sweepers amounted to an offence under the section. It appears that on 10th April they had sent a notice to the Board demanding an increase of pay. Having received no reply to this they on 20th April sent a further notice threatening to strike on 1st May unless their demands were granted. This notice appears to have been sent by almost the entire staff of the sweepers of the Municipality. On 1st May they abandoned their work in accordance with the notice. It appears that the matter was under the consideration of the Municipal Board and no reply had been given to their notice. The Magistrate thereupon sent for ten of the ring-leaders and on their admitting the facts sentenced them by a summary trial as stated above. The procedure adopted was drastic and could only be justified by the extreme danger to the health of the town which would result if it was left unscavenged. The Magistrate has stated in his explanation that he examined the Health Officer in one case and the latter stated that there was danger of a cholera epidemic. It is said that the trial was illegal but having regard to the provisions of sections 242 and 243 of the Criminal Procedure Code I am not prepared to hold that this was the case. The judgment has also been attacked but it complies strictly with the provisions of section 263, Criminal Procedure Code.

A plea has been taken on the ground of sentence. The accused are now on bail having already served more than a month and a half of their sentence. The danger which led to the proceedings has passed and in my opinion it is not necessary to send them back to jail to undergo the remainder of their sentence. I accordingly reduce the sentence to the amount already undergone but in other respects dismiss the applications.

Crim. Rev. No. 344 of 1923, decided on 15th June, 1923, against the order of the Sessions Judge, Mainpuri, dated 7th April, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 115—Order of restoration without notice to custodian and without enquiry as to his title is bad.

Four men were charged a long time ago with stealing 59 bags of mustard seed from the grain market. The thieves dealt with the seed by selling 113 maunds of it to the petitioner. This transaction by the present petitioner took place at a considerable distance, i.e. 30 or 40 miles from the scene of the crime. No charge was made against them for receiving stolen property. After one trial of three of the thieves had taken place in the year 1921 and after a second trial of the fourth thief had taken place in the midsummer 1922, on the 17th of February, 1923, a first Class Magistrate issued an order attaching other property of the applicants as security or by way of satisfaction, for an assumed liability of the value of the grain which they had purchased two years before in the ordinary course of their business.

Held, that the proceeding was absolutely unintelligible and had no reasonable basis. [P. 189, Cs. 1 and 2].

J. M. Banerjee—for the Petitioner.

Judgment:—This appears to be an outrageous proceeding lacking either in legal justification or common sense, so far as I can understand. From the somewhat scanty materials before me, it appears that four men were charged a long time ago with stealing 59 bags of mustard seed from the grain market. The thieves appear to have dealt with the seed by selling 113 maunds of it to the firm of the present petitioner. This transaction by the present petitioner's firm took place at a considerable distance, i.e., 30 or 40 miles from the scene of the crime. No charge has been made against them for receiving, nor could any such charge be reasonably made. They allege that they gave every facility to the prosecution to trace the accused, showing the dealings which the thieves had had in the commodity, and produced their books to show that they themselves as purchasers had dealt with the grain in the ordinary course of business. Under such circumstances as these a Criminal Court ought to hesitate a long time before making an order for restitution even if the goods were still in esse. Where a question of bona fides and of title by purchase, or otherwise, clearly arises, the duty of the Criminal Court is to leave the complainant to his remedy in the Civil Court if he thinks he has one. But so far as I can gather from section 515 the jurisdiction of the Criminal Court is confined to an order at the conclusion of the trial for the disposal of the property which has been stolen and which is before it in the criminal proceeding. It need not be in the possession of the court, but it must be still capable of being earmarked, and such an order can only be made at the conclusion of the trial and in the presence of the purchaser of the commodity who has a right to be heard. According to the allegation made before me, which derives corroboration from what the Sessions Judge has said in his judgment dealing with an application which was subsequently made to him, it appears that what has happened is this. After one trial of three of the thieves had taken place in the year 1921, and after a second trial of the 4th thief had taken place in midsummer 1922, on the 17th of February, 1923, a first class Magistrate issued an order attaching other property of the applicants as security, or by way of satisfaction, for an assumed liability of the value of the grain which they had purchased two years before in the ordinary course of their business, and it is alleged before me that moveable property of the applicants is now under attachment. But shortly the action of the Magistrate may be summarised in this way that, it is equivalent, not merely to hearing and adjudicating, but also to issuing execution upon a judgment in a suit for damages in favour of somebody or another, who is not before him, against somebody else who had no notice of the proceeding. Such a proceeding has no relation as far as I can see to anything known to the law either in the Criminal or Civil Code. If it is possible to give it a legal terminology it would appear that the order of attachment is equivalent to an order of an execution court executing a decree for Rs. 855-8-3 as damages for a cause of action which I am unable to specify against a person who has never been sued and who was not even before the court. If it be the fact that the order was made six months after the last trial that is sufficient to condemn it, but apart from that the proceeding seems to be absolutely unintelligible and to have no reasonable basis. I am quite unable to understand what the Magistrate thought he was doing. The Sessions Judge himself was obviously in a difficulty in applying any legal phraseology to the proceeding, and he resorted to the convenient colloqualism in saying that the original owners of the mustard seed "wanted their mustard back." I have no doubt they did, but most people whose property is stolen want it back, or its price. That does not give a cause of action, and certainly does not give, jurisdiction under this section. I have taken the unusual course of dealing with the matter summarily because the petition, which ought to have been supported by an affidavit, appears to state facts which are uncontradicted, and which are corroborated by the Sessions Judge's judgment. I am not surprised that the Sessions Judge felt himself incompetent to deal with the proceeding and got out of the difficulty by denying himself jurisdiction to interfere with an order, which had no jurisdiction in its inception. I am willing to listen to any representation which the District Magistrate chooses to make to me, or the Magistrate who made this order, if they find it worthwhile to pursue this matter any further. No harm can be done by quashing the whole proceeding forthwith, because if this application is based upon any misrepresentation of fact, I can set aside this order and revive the attachment, and if the Magistrate is right in thinking that he can make this order at any time after the trial, there is no reason why on giving notice to the applicants he should not try and make another, though I do not suggest that he should do so. A copy of this order must be sent to the District Magistrate of Agra with a direction that no further proceedings of any kind in relation to this attachment be permitted, and I direct that such property as has been attached be released from attachment. A further copy must be sent to the District Magistrate of Mainpuri and I suggest to him that he should call upon the first class Magistrate who made this order to explain himself. If either of these gentlemen wish to submit any explanation to this Court, it may be sent to me and I will deal with it in due course, but I do not require this to be done because I think the whole proceeding was illegal and the less I hear of it the better.

The Crown—Opposite party.

Crim. Rev. No. 352 of 1923, decided on 8th August, 1923, from the order of the District Magistrate, Cawnpore, dated 7th April, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 4 (h)—Report by a Subordinate Magistrate to his superior, stating facts and his opinion thereon, is a complaint.

While a criminal case was pending before Mr. Christie, a Magistrate, an agreement was signed by Sarju Prasad undertaking to pay Rs. 4,000 to the complainant in case the criminal case was withdrawn. This agreement was filed by the complainant. Later on it was discovered that one word amanat in the document had been cut out and it purports to have been initialled. In a separate enquiry Mr. Christie recorded some evidence and then in a long report submitted the facts to the District Magistrate. He referred to the verbal report which he had made to that officer previously and after setting forth all the facts in detail expressed his opinion that he was certain that the alteration was made after the document was filed in Court and that Sarju Prasad had not only committed perjury but had committed an offence under S. 477, Penal Code. He, however, made no order under S. 476. On receipt of this report the District Magistrate passed the order under which he directed the prosecution of Sarju Prasad on two alternative charges under S. 193 and directed that the case should go to a Subordinate Magistrate for disposal.

Held that the report of Mr. Christie cannot in any sense be treated as an order under S. 476, Cr. P. C., but the report falls within the definition of complaint as given in S. 4 (h) and his order therefore cannot be said to have been passed without any jurisdiction. (26 All. 514, Ref.) [P. 191, C. 1 and 2].

G. W. Dillon—for the Applicant.

The Asst. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is an application for revision from an order of the District Magistrate of Cawnpore, dated the 7th of April, 1923. The point urged against it is that this order was passed without jurisdiction and is liable to be set aside.

It is not necessary to go into the previous history of the litigation, and it is sufficient to say that while a criminal case was pending before Mr. Christie, having been brought by Gauri Charan Misir against Shanker Prasad, an agreement was signed by Sarju Prasad (the present applicant) undertaking to pay Rs. 4,000 to the complainant in case the criminal case was withdrawn. This agreement was filed by Gauri Charan Misir.

Later on it was discovered that one word "amanat" in the document had been cut out and it purports to have been initialled. The offence being a non-compoundable one there was of course no compromise but ultimately the accused was acquitted.

In a separate enquiry Mr. Christie recorded some evidence, and then in a long report, dated the 18th of March, 1923, submitted the facts of the case to the District Magistrate. He begins his report by referring to the verbal report which he had made to that officer previously, and after setting forth all the facts in detail, expressed his opinion that he was certain that the alteration was made after the document was filed in court, and that Sarju Prasad had not only committed perjury but had committed an offence punishable under section 477 of the Indian Penal Code. He however made no order under section 476 directing the prosecution of Sarju Prasad.

On receipt of this report the District Magistrate passed the order which is questioned in this revision. Under this order he directed the prosecution of Sarju Prasad on two alternative charges under section 193 and directed that the case should go to Khan Bahadur Maulvi Muhammad Abdul Hamid Khan for disposal.

On behalf of the applicant it is contended that the report of Mr. Christie does not amount to an order under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and that the District Magistrate had no jurisdiction whatsoever to pass any such order. On this hypothesis it is urged that the applicant cannot be prosecuted.

There can be no doubt that the report of Mr. Christie cannot in any sense be treated as an order under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; but at the same time inasmuch as it gives all the facts of the case and mentions that in the opinion of Mr. Christie, Sarju Prasad had been guilty of offences under sections 193 and 477, and inasmuch as these facts were submitted to the District Magistrate, who had jurisdiction to take cognizance of such offences, it is clear that the report falls within the definition of "complaint" as given in section 4 (h). In this view of the matter the District Magistrate had before him a complaint made by Mr. Christie. Under section 190 (a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, he had power to take cognizance of these offences, and under section 192 (1) he could transfer the case for trial to another Magistrate subordinate to him. Whatever the intention of the District Magistrate might have been in substance, his order amounts to taking cognizance of the two offences and the sending of the case to a Magistrate appointed by him to try it. This order therefore cannot be said to have been passed without any jurisdiction. So long as there is either the previous sanction or complaint of the court in, or in relation to, any proceedings in which court the offence under section 193 of the Indian Penal Code has been committed, the provisions of section 195 (1) (h) of the Code of Criminal Procedure are fully complied with.

The first alleged offence is that Sarju Prasad in his statement, dated the 23rd of October, 1922, before Mr. Christie, had stated that the word "amanat" had been erased by him before the document was put in Court. If this statement is proved to be false, there can be no doubt that the applicant would be guilty of an offence under section 193 of the Indian Penal Code. The second alleged false statement is that he has made a false entry in the said document with a view to its appearing in a judicial proceeding and caused an erroneous opinion to be formed by the Magistrate in his judicial proceeding, that is, has fabricated false evidence. It will be for the trying Magistrate to see whether, even if the first charge is proved, it is sufficiently established that the applicant did make the false entry in the document with a view to its appearing in a judicial proceeding. It is to be noted that he was no party to the proceedings in which this document was filed and it may be that some other person interested was responsible for the alteration.

In conclusion I may say that the case is very much similar to the case reported in 26 All. 514.

In the view which I have expressed this application must be dismissed. It is accordingly rejected.

Crim. Rev. No. 367 of 1923, decided on 16th August, 1923, from the order of the Addl. Sessions Judge, Jaunpore, dated 19th May, 1923.

Penal Code. S. 411—Mere discovery of stolen article in a roofless room of accused's house does not render him guilty.

A burglary was committed in the house of one Maharaji and she made a report the next morning giving a list of articles including wearing apparel. Among the articles she mentioned was a dhoti said to have had a tear in the border. A few days after the police searched the accused's house and in the presence of two search witnesses a dhoti was found hanging on a peg in a roofless room. This room contained some other articles of household besides the dhoti. In front of this room there was another room covered by a roof and then there was a thatched portion of the house in which the accused, his wife and children lived. Mt. Maharaji and her son both recognised the dhoti as belonging to them.

Held that an accused person cannot be convicted under S. 411 merely on showing that he was in possession of certain property and failed to account for its possession. The prosecution must prove both that the property was stolen and that the accused received it or retained it dishonestly. But under certain circumstances a Court is entitled to draw presumption under S. 114 of the Evidence Act from the fact of possession. In the present case however there is no necessary inference that the accused had knowledge that the dhoti was concealed in the room attached to this house. (6 All. 224, Ref.) [P. 193, C. 1.]

M. Ahmad—for the Applicant.

The Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Sulaiman J.:—This is a criminal revision from a conviction under section 411 of the Indian Penal Code. On the 23rd of April, 1923, a burglary was committed in the house of one Musammat Maharaji, and she made a report the next morning, giving a list of articles including wearing apparel. It is important to note that among the articles she mentioned was a dhoti said to have had a tear in the border. A few days after that the police searched the accused's house and, it is said, in the presence of two search witnesses, only one of whom has been examined in this case, a dhoti was found hanging on a peg in a room which has no roof over it. This room contained some other articles of household besides the dhoti. In front of this room there is another room, which is covered by a roof, and then there is a thatched portion of the house in which the accused, his wife and children live.

Musammat Maharaji and her son both recognised the dhoti as belonging to them, and the accused has been convicted under section 411 of receiving or retaining stolen property.

The defence put forward on behalf of the accused was that some 5 or 6 years before the alleged occurrence, he had filed a complaint for bribery against a local police officer and that therefore the police had a grudge against him. It was further suggested on his behalf that inasmuch as this room had no roof over it, it was very easy for any one to plant the dhoti in it.

Both the courts below accepted the evidence of Musammat Maharaji and her son to the effect that the dhoti discovered in the accused's house was the one which had been stolen from her house.

In revision I am bound to accept this finding as final. Although the dhoti was an article of common use, nevertheless as it had a tear in the border, which was a good identifying mark, I am unable to say that the finding of the courts below as to the identity of this dhoti was in any way unjustified.

The question still remains whether these facts are sufficient for the conviction of the applicant.

Section 411 of the Indian Penal Code makes dishonestly receiving or retaining any stolen property, knowing or having belief that the same was stolen property, punishable. Of course it is obvious that there is a distinction between receiving and retaining it, and merely being in constructive possession of it. It was pointed out by Oldfield, J., in the case of 6 All. 224, that an accused person cannot be convicted under section 411 merely on showing that he was in possession of certain property and failed to account for its possession. The prosecution must prove both that the property was stolen and that the accused received it or retained it dishonestly. At the same time it is to be borne in mind that under certain circumstances a Court is entitled to draw a presumption under section 114 of the Evidence Act from the fact of possession. If the possession of an article is proved the court may presume that the person in possession of the stolen goods soon after the theft is either guilty of theft or of receiving the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession, vide illustration (a). The question then remains whether the circumstances of this case are such that it is justifiable to draw the presumption of the guilt of the accused under section 114 from the mere fact that the dhoti was found in his house. The room in which this dhoti was found is not one in which the accused habitually sleeps. He is not the only occupant of the house; there are his wife and children who also live in it. The dhoti is a "zanana" one which would ordinarily be worn by a woman. There is no evidence to show that the accused was ever seen in possession of the dhoti. It is true that he is the master of the house, and in that way he may be said to be in constructive possession of everything in the house. But in order to infer a guilty intention from the mere fact of constructive possession, it is necessary to show something more which would justify a court in inferring that he had knowledge of its existence in the house. For instance if the articles were in a place which is constantly used by the accused, and being in such a place could not have been overlooked by him, the inference would be justified. Or from its bulk or other circumstances like the locking up of it by him in a box, the court may presume that the accused had knowledge that the article was in the house. In the present case however I find it impossible to say that there is a necessary inference that the accused had knowledge that the dhoti was concealed in the room attached to his house. There is no other evidence against him but the fact that the article was discovered in his house. This therefore leaves a reasonable doubt in my mind that the accused himself might not have been the person who actually received this article. It is necessary to suggest who else might have been the person concerned. There is a possibility that any one of the other occupants might have received it and retained it. I therefore feel bound to give the accused the benefit of the doubt. I allow this application, set aside the conviction and sentence passed on him, and direct that he be released.

Under S. 510 any document purporting to be a report under the hand of a chemical examiner upon any matter duly submitted to him for examination and report may be used as evidence in any enquiry, trial or other proceeding. This however does not imply that without tendering it in evidence it can be made use of for the first time in appeal. It is a piece of evidence that does not require any formal proof but at the same time it must be tendered as evidence and used as such so that the accused may have a chance of questioning it. [P. 194, C. 2.]

M. Ahmad and H. Kapur—for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a criminal revision from an appellate order, convicting the accused under section 60 (a) of the Excise Act for being in possession of cocaine.

The prosecution case was that the accused was caught red handed by a constable while he was buying betals and three packets of cocaine were recovered from him. A number of witnesses were produced to prove that three packets were recovered from the accused by the constable. That evidence was believed by the learned Magistrate. It now appears that some packets, alleged to have been those which were recovered from the accused, were sent on to the Chemical Examiner who sent report to the effect that they contained cocaine. This report however was never formally tendered in evidence at the trial, nor does it appear from the record of the trial Magistrate's Court, that this report was used as evidence in the proceedings. No copy of it was ever placed on the record of this case. In the judgment the learned Magistrate did not even refer to it, but based his finding that the packets contained cocaine, on the ground that the accused himself admits that he had cocaine in his possession. A reference to the statement of the accused, recorded in the vernacular under section 364 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, shows that the Magistrate's remarks is not accurate. In answer to the question put to him as to whether the three packets of cocaine were recovered from him, he replied that three packets were recovered from him, but he went on to say that they were handed to him by a man named Babu and that the accused did not know what these packets actually contained. His statement should not therefore have been used as an admission that he had cocaine in his possession. Unfortunately, the prosecution did not take care to see that the report was formally tendered in evidence, nor did the Magistrate take the trouble to have it brought on the record. In the absence of that report it is impossible to say that the powder in the packets was necessarily cocaine. There is apparently no other evidence to show that any one tasted it or that any one was satisfied that these packets contained nothing but cocaine.

The accused however was convicted, and an appeal was preferred to the court below. Arguments were heard on the 29th of June, 1923, when it was pressed on his behalf that there was no evidence on the record to show that the packets did contain cocaine. On the 2nd of July the learned Additional Sessions Judge ordered the Government Pleader to produce the report of the Chemical Examiner. A report was sent for, which was on the record of another proceeding to which the accused was no party. After a perusal of this report, and apparently without any further argument, and without any formal order admitting this additional evidence, the learned Additional Sessions Judge dismissed the appeal holding that the report on the file of the other record conclusively established that the packets contained cocaine.

I am of opinion that this additional evidence ought not to have been perused in appeal unless the provisions of section 428 of the Code of Criminal Procedure were complied with. No reasons were recorded, and no formal order admitting it was passed. It was treated as if it were a piece of evidence already on the record. Under section 510 of the Code of Criminal Procedure any document purporting to be a report under the hand of a Chemical Examiner upon any matter duly submitted to him for examination and report may be used as evidence in any enquiry, trial or other proceeding. This however does not imply that without tendering it in evidence it can be made use of for the first time in appeal. It is a piece of evidence that does not require any formal proof, but at the same time it must be tendered as evidence and used as such, so that the accused may have a chance of questioning the identity of the packets. I am satisfied that this was not done in the present case. In failure of the report having been formally brought on the record, there is really no satisfactory evidence to show that the powder contained in these packets was cocaine.

The case must therefore fall to the ground. I set aside the order convicting the accused and acquit him of the charge. He is already on bail. The bail bond will be cancelled.

Cr. Ref. No. 379 of 1923, decided on 19th July, 1923, from the Sessions Judge of Ghazipur, dated 9th July, 1923.

Penal Code, S. 1—Nuisance—Public Nuisance—Annoyance even to one person is sufficient.

It is necessary in order to establish a charge of committing a nuisance in a public place to the annoyance of residents or passengers in the locality, to prove that somebody was annoyed. Annoyance to one person is sufficient. If a public servant, likely a municipal employee whose duty it is to look after the cleanliness of the streets sees anybody easing himself in a public place or street he is not unlikely to be annoyed. [P. 195, C. 1.]

K. Varma—for the Applicant.

Walsh, J.:—This case has been referred to the High Court really for the decision of the question whether it is necessary in order to establish a charge of committing a nuisance in a public place to the annoyance of residents or passengers in the locality, to prove that somebody was annoyed. The Act certainly says so, and I do not see how anybody can seriously doubt it. But annoyance to one person is sufficient, and even annoyance itself is a question of degree, and if a public servant, like a Municipal employee whose duty it is to look after the cleanliness of the streets sees anybody easing himself in a public place or street, he is not unlikely to be annoyed. When you come to think of it, it is his business to be annoyed. He ought to be annoyed. A person trying to keep the streets clean who sees anybody easing himself, would be very wrong if he was not annoyed. In fact his employers would have every right to be annoyed with him, if he was not and therefore if he reports it in his official capacity and gives evidence of the act, it is a reasonable inference to draw that he was annoyed. Whether the jamidar in this particular instance attempted to define and put into precise language the degree of annoyance which he felt, does not appear, because the case was summarily tried. But it is reasonable to suppose that he was very much annoyed, and that if he was pressed on the question he would have said so. It turns out that between the offender and the jamadar there has been a terrible feud about the refusal to sell cloth on credit, and the jamadar according to the defence, harboured feelings of anger and indignation towards the offender. When one comes to picture the scene, if it is correct that in the course of his patrolling the streets in the interests of health and cleanliness this jamadar, armed with the authority of the law, saw this individual, against whom he had this grudge, committing an act of nature in one of the very places which was calculated to injure the public interest which the jamadar had to look after, one can imagine that his annoyance was very great indeed. It has not been found to be fictitious annoyance or mala fide, but the Magistrate has found that the case has been proved. I must assume that he meant what he said and that he was satisfied that the jamadar was sufficiently annoyed. I agree with the Sessions Judge that the matter is of importance, but it seems to me to have been hardly worthwhile referring it to the High Court, because, although every one must agree with the Sessions Judge that an ordinary person would consider the act objectionable, it is impossible to say, when the section requires the act to be one done to the annoyance of the public, that annoyance must not be proved. But it is sufficient if one person is annoyed, and as the act complained of can hardly be proved except by some person who comes forward to complain, the annoyance is almost necessarily involved in the complaint. It therefore comes to this, that all that is required is that the act was done in such a way as to annoy a person who complained of it. The proceeding in the court below before the Sessions Judge was revision, and I am not at liberty to consider any point really except that referred to me. Mr. Kamlakant Varma has also contended that a drain by the side of the road does not come within the description contained in the Act of an open place. That is a question of fact. It was not raised in the court below, and presumably a drain by the side of the road is not only in an open place but in a thoroughfare, which is sufficient. It would appear that there must have been an open place to enable the Jamadar to see the offence. I merely therefore hold that the conviction was one according to law, and I direct the record to be returned to the Sessions Judge.

Conviction upheld.

The Crown—Opposite party.

Cr. Rev. No. 382 of 1923, decided on 15th August, 1923, against the order of the Sessions Judge, Agra, dated 26th June, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 107—The accused must have been members of one gang to justify joint trial—In a joint trial evidence against each accused must be considered separately.

There is no direct prohibition against trying a number of persons under S. 107 jointly. But unless it is apparent that the various persons against whom proceedings are taken form a gang, it is highly unfair and unjust that they should be proceeded against jointly. The effect of such a proceeding is that it is unnecessarily protracted and the parties thereby prejudiced. Furthermore if by any chance such a proceeding is conducted jointly, it is essential that the case of each accused should be considered separately and individually. (20 A. 881, Foll.)

When an objection as to the impropriety of the joint proceeding was taken in the first Court and when the evidence has not been taken separately against each accused but has been lumped together and when it is impossible to discover from the judgments of the trial and appellate Courts how much of the evidence was believed and how much rejected.

Held, that the accused has been gravely prejudiced by the proceeding taken against him in conjunction with other accused persons. [P. 197, C. 1.]

M. A. Aziz—for the Applicant.
Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is an application on behalf of Muhammad Ismail from an order passed against him under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Proceedings were taken against the applicant along with three other persons under the above section by means of a police report. So far as the police report is concerned it is conceded that there was no suggestion whatever in it which would show that all the persons against whom the proceedings were started were members of a gang. It also does appear from the judgment of the learned Magistrate that an objection was raised on behalf of the accused as to the impropriety, not to say illegality, of a joint trial.

The learned Magistrate in his judgment observed that although it was true that Ismail was not specifically named in the initial report, and that the police report is silent on the point of the accused belonging to a gang, he thought that inasmuch as the evidence had been led on behalf of the prosecution that the four accused were members of a gang, the objection could not be taken at that stage. He came to the conclusion that the accused along with the other persons should be bound over. This order was affirmed on appeal.

The judgments of the trying Magistrate as well as that of the appellate Court have been read over to me, and I have perused them carefully. I regret to say that it is impossible to discover from either of the judgments what the exact case against the applicant was, that is to say, what was the purport of the evidence given against him specifically by the prosecution witnesses.

It is true that in the Criminal Procedure Code there is no direct prohibition against trying a number of persons under section 107 jointly. But at the same time the propriety of such a proceeding is obvious. Unless it is apparent that the various persons against whom proceedings were taken form a gang, it is highly unfair and unjust that they should be proceeded against jointly. The effect of such a proceeding is that it is unnecessarily protracted and the parties thereby prejudiced. Furthermore if by any chance such a proceeding is conducted jointly, it is essential that the case of each accused should be considered separately and individually. As observed by Walsh, J., in the case reported in 20 All. 881 such proceedings should be confined to each person alone unless the case was that he was a confederate or partner with other persons to whom all the evidence is equally applicable.

The mere fact of there having been a joint proceeding would not have induced me to interfere in this case if I were not satisfied that there has been a consequent failure of justice.

The learned Assistant Government Advocate concedes that by reading the judgments of the two Courts it is impossible for him even to sift the evidence against the accused and point out what is the prosecution case as against him. The learned Magistrate remarked in his judgment that 19 witnesses were examined for the prosecution. Out of these he only named five. He went on to add that all these witnesses unanimously declared that the accused were of one gang. This statement is certainly not accurate. I have had the statements of Lala Har Prasad, Thakur Prithi Singh and Syed Ali Husain, the first three witnesses named by him, read over to me, and they do not say that the accused are members of gang. Fakir Chand, another witness named, does say so. The learned Magistrate however did not consider the case against each of the accused separately. By a perusal of his judgment one is led to imagine that all the witnesses necessarily deposed against all the accused in respect of all the offences of which they were charged. This obviously was not so.

The learned Sessions Judge in appeal has fallen into the same error. He remarked that "the accused, or some of them, have been suspected in connection with the following crimes which took place recently". This is followed by a list of the offences. But it is impossible to discover which of the offences in that list are attributable to the accused or are those in which the applicant was suspected. The evidence for the prosecution has been lumped together, and no discrimination has been made as regards the different accused persons. I have had the statement of three police officers read to me and from their statements which are mentioned in the lower appellate Court's judgment, it appears that so far as the present applicant was concerned there had never been any search of his house—he had not been suspected on any specific occasion, other than the kidnapping of the Musammat Janmata or Musammat Jamo. In fact one Police officer, Ali Hasan, says that he did not know anything against the accused. As to the case of Musammat Janmati, it appears that she had been kidnapped and disappeared. It was suspected that her ornaments were stolen and that she had been done away with. The applicant Ismail was suspected in that action and was in jail but ultimately as there was no sufficient evidence against him he was discharged. On the very day when he came out of jail he was arrested under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This is the only instance in which suspicion fell on him as mentioned by the Police officers. There are of course general statements of his being a man of bad character and certain suspicions, which are not specific in their nature. In a case of this kind when an objection as to the impropriety of the joint proceeding was taken in the first court, and when the evidence has not been taken separately against each accused, but has been lumped together, and when it is impossible to discover from the judgments of either courts how much of the evidence was believed and how much rejected, I am bound to hold that the accused has been gravely prejudiced by the proceeding taken against him in conjunction with the other accused persons.

I accordingly allow this application, set aside the order under section 110 passed against him, and cancel the security demanded.

Revision allowed.

v.

King-Emperor—Opposite party.

Cr. Rev. No. 388 of 1923, decided on 14th August, 1923, against the order of the Sessions Judge, Budaun, dated the 2nd July, 1923.

Penal Code, S. 384—Threat to omit to do some act which accused is not legally bound to do is not covered by the section.

After the crops of judgment-debtor were attached by officer of Court, the accused took money from judgment-debtor promising to get the crops released.

Held, no offence was committed.

Before a person can be said to put any person into fear of any injury to that person, it must appear that he has held out some threat to do or to omit to do what he is legally bound to do in the future. On the other hand if all that a man does is to promise to do a thing which he is not legally bound to do and says if money is not paid to him he would not do that thing, such an act does not amount to an offence. [P. 198, C. 2.]

But a threat held out by the accused that he would not release the cattle belonging to complainant and taken away by the accused without his consent, unless he was paid some money for their release, does amount to extortion inasmuch as he did put him in fear of injury to his property, namely the cattle, as he must have felt that his cattle would remain with the accused so long as the money was not paid to him. This would be sufficient injury within the meaning of S. 44 of the Indian Penal Code. [P. 200, C. 1.]

H. M. Ahmad—for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Judgment:—This is a criminal revision from an order convicting the applicant under section 384 of the Indian Penal Code. The case against the accused is to be split up into two parts, although the sentence is one for both the convictions.

The first charge against the accused was that he extorted a sum of Rs. 45 and a further sum of Rs. 20 from one Jodha Teli. It appears that the Co-operative Bank had a decree against one Behari Brahmin and others. In execution of this decree the amin was sent to the village to attach property belonging to the judgment-debtors. Mr. Tandon, the Assistant Manager, the present accused who is the Secretary of the Society, and the auditor of the Bank also appear to have accompanied the amin to the village. It is said that on the 29th of November, 1921, the accused pointed out certain crops as belonging to the judgment-debtors, and on the crops having been so pointed out the amin attached them. The document signed by the amin shows that the crops were pointed out by the Assistant Manager as well as by the Secretary. The paper was signed by the Assistant Manager, admitting that he pointed out the crops, but was signed by the Secretary as a witness. The fact, however, remains that neither the Assistant Manager, nor the Secretary had power to attach the crops. It was the amin alone who had authority to do so and there can be no doubt that the act of attachment must be attributed to the amin and to no one else.

The crops attached by the amin however did not as a matter of fact belong to Behari Brahmin. Jodha was a co-sharer of Behari in some fields, though not necessarily of the fields of which the crops had been attached. The crops belonged to Jodha and consequently he protested against the attachment. The story told by some of the prosecution witnesses is that before the attachment took place the accused wanted some money and promised in return not to get these crops attached. This however is said to have happened in the village itself. The accused is not charged with anything that happened in the village, but is charged with having extorted money at Budaun. The occurrence at Budaun was some two days after the attachment had been made. Jodha accompanied by two other persons went to the accused and begged of him to get the crops released. The accused promised to get them released and settled his gratification at Rs. 65, out of which Rs. 45 were paid to him then and there, and the balance was paid in the village some months after.

Both the courts below have accepted the prosecution story that the accused did receive the sum of Rs. 45 and Rs. 20 from Jodha Teli. In revision I cannot say that the courts below were wrong in believing that story. The question still remains whether the facts constituted an offence within the meaning of section 383 of the Indian Penal Code. I have had the statement of the complainant read over to me, and the story told by him as to what happened at Budaun is that when he begged of the accused to get the crops released the accused abused him, threatened him, and said that if he did not pay him the money then, he should go and file objections. I note here that the learned Magistrate who took down the notes of the evidence in English has wrongly translated this portion of Ajodhia's actual statement as implying that he would get him convicted in some case. That he is clearly wrong is borne out by a comparison with the evidence recorded in the vernacular. I am asked on behalf of the prosecution to connect what happened at the village with what happened at Budaun, and to say that the whole thing was a continuation of a single transaction and the accused is guilty on all the facts taken in conjunction. The statement made by the accused in the village would be a threat held out by him that if some money was not paid to him the crops would be attached by the amin whereas the promise held out by the accused at Budaun was that if the money was not paid he would not try to get the crops released; otherwise the aggrieved party would have to go and file objections. In my opinion there is a clear distinction between these two statements. One may cause a fear, the other only raises a hope. Before a person can be said to put any person into fear of any injury to that person, it must appear that he has held out some threat to do or to omit to do what he is legally bound to do in the future. On the other hand if all that a man does is to promise to do a thing which he is not legally bound to do and says if money is not paid to him he would not do that thing, I cannot hold that such an act amounts to an offence. In the present case there can be no doubt that after the attachment had been duly made by the amin, the accused had no authority whatsoever to release the crops. The only authority which could do so would be the authority of the Bank. It is suggested that the accused's father is some high official in the Bank and he has influence with the father and it is suggested that the accused might have hinted that he would persuade his father to get the crops released. Assuming that to be so, even then the act would not be an offence under section 383. If a person promises to speak favourably to a person in authority and to do his best to induce him to do something, and in consideration of this promise receives money, I am not prepared to hold that he has threatened to cause injury to the person who gives the money and thereby committed extortion. If the accused was not legally bound to do anything to get the crops released, and if he promised to do something on payment of some money, then, unless the act come within the definition of bribe, I am of opinion that he cannot be convicted of extortion.

In this view of the matter, even assuming all the facts found against him in connection with the first charge, his conviction was not proper.

The second charge against the accused was that he extorted a sum of Rs. 5 from one Behari (this man is other than Behari Brahman). He was not a judgment-debtor of the Bank at all. It is said that while Behari was inside his house, and his cattle were tied outside it, the accused took them away, and when Behari came out and protested and asked for their release, the accused said he would not release them unless some money was paid to him. Behari paid Rs. 5 to the accused and got his cattle released. Behari admittedly was not a judgment-debtor of the Bank and it cannot be disputed that legally his cattle could not be attached in execution of any decree of the Bank. Besides the statement of the complainant Behari, two other witnesses, Mukan Ram and Dulli Chamar were produced on behalf of the prosecution to prove the payment of Rs. 5 by Behari. These witnesses have been believed by both the courts below. In the ordinary way I would have been bound to accept these findings as conclusive in revision unless there was something grossly absurd or improbable in the story. I find however that in the course of the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge there is a remark to the effect :—" It must be remembered that Mr. Tandon admitted that he had heard that the appellant's conduct was not satisfactory ". This is a matter which the learned Sessions Judge took into account when considering the case against the accused in connection with the payment of Rs. 5 said to have been made by Behari. Obviously the statement made by Mr. Tandon that he had previously heard that the appellant's conduct was not satisfactory, was not legally admissible against him in this case and it was not therefore a statement which should have been considered at all. It was owing to this circumstance that I felt myself bound in fairness to the accused to go into the evidence again and consider it. At the same time I must point out that this statement was not made by either of the courts below a basis for believing the evidence for the prosecution. The courts below were satisfied in their minds that the story told by the three witnesses for the prosecution was substantially true. That being so, I have to see whether there is anything which would justify me to say that the courts below were wrong in believing these witnesses. If the story told by them were grossly impossible or absurd, I would have no hesitation to differ from the view taken by the courts below. The story told by Behari is that although he had not seen the amin in the village, he found the accused who was an official of the Bank "attaching" cattle. It is true that some months afterwards Behari did make a statement to the Sub-Inspector that he had complained to the amin about the matter and the amin had refused to hear him. On oath however Behari admitted that he had not seen the amin in the village and had not spoken to him at all. There is certainly therefore this fact that Behari paid this sum of Rs. 5, and after that he took no further steps against him, that is to say, he made no complaint to the Bank nor filed any complaint in court. It was long afterwards when an enquiry was set on foot by the Assistant Registrar of Co-operative Banks that he made a statement. At the same time it must be borne in mind that an ordinary villager might very well content himself with getting his cattle released on payment of Rs. 5 and may not think it worthwhile to go all the way to town to make a complaint which would result in a prosecution. Had I been sitting as a court of appeal, it is possible that I might have come to a different conclusion. But in revision when this oral evidence has been accepted by both the courts below, I do not feel justified in saying that the statements of those witnesses are such as cannot possibly be believed. I do not find in the story told by these witnesses anything so absurd or impossible as to make it difficult to give it credibility.

The case as found against the applicant therefore is that he without any right took away cattle belonging to Behari and declined to release them until he was paid a sum of Rs. 5 and that it was on receipt of Rs. 5 that he released them. A threat held out by the accused that he would not release the cattle belonging to Behari, and taken away by the accused without Behari's consent, unless he was paid some money for their release, does in my opinion amount to extortion inasmuch as he did put Behari in fear of injury to his property, namely, the cattle, as he must have felt that his cattle would remain with the accused so long as the money was not paid to him. This would be sufficient injury within the meaning of section 44 of the Indian Penal Code.

Accepting therefore the finding of fact arrived at by the courts below I cannot hold that no offence under section 383 was committed with respect to the receipt of this sum of Rs. 5.

As I am acquitting the accused of the offence of extorting Rs. 65 and only upholding his conviction as to extorting Rs. 5 I think that a substantial reduction in the sentence would be just.

I accordingly allow this application in part and set aside the conviction and sentence on the accused with regard to extorting Rs. 65 from Jodha and acquit him of that offence. I, however, uphold the conviction for extorting Rs. 5, from Behari but reduce the sentence to the period of rigorous imprisonment already undergone by the accused and a fine of Rs. 100. If the accused has paid anything over and above Rs. 100 the excess amount will be refunded. In default of payment of Rs. 100 the accused will undego rigorous imprisonment for a further period of one week.

Sentence reduced.

Cr. Ref. No. 392 of 1923, decided on 24th July, 1923, on reference made by the Sessions Judge, Saharanpur.

(a) U. P. Municipalities Act, Ss. 178 and 214—Alteration in a wall is alteration in building.

The expression "an alteration in a building" in S. 178, sub-section (3), must include a part of such building. The definition in S. 214 of a part of a building lays down what is to be read into this expression when it is used. But it is not inconsistent with a wall supplementary to or accessary to a verandah or balcony or house or other larger building, being in itself a building within the meaning of S. 178.

(b) Criminal trial—Conviction—Fine should not be inflicted in technical offences.

Penalties must be provided and penalty sections must be used for bad cases where the individual has been contumacious and has palpably acted mala fide. But the penalty is only intended in terrorem and not to be used vindictively for technical offences. [P. 201, C. 1.]

The parties were not represented.

Judgment:—In dealing with this reference I am even more handicapped than was the learned Judge. It is really a question of fact. To some extent it is a question for experts. These questions of whether buildings correspond with sanctioned plans, many of which are not too precise or accurate in detail, are sometimes very difficult and require expert evidence and explanation, and I am practically without any material at all. It is impossible to decide between the respective merits and opinions of the Sessions Judge and the Magistrate respectively in this case, in a discussion of plans and erections neither of which I have seen. On three points of principle I can express my opinion. A Municipality taking proceedings for a penalty under this Act, ought to make its sanction and orders or conditions for new buildings or erections so conspicuously clear as to leave no room for controversy. If in a particular case before me as a Magistrate they failed to do so, I should dismiss the complaint. Secondly the learned Judge is quite right, and the Magistrate should never have allowed the case to proceed before him without the production of the Municipal file. On the other hand I agree with the Magistrate that to erect a wall, which for this purpose must be part of a building and therefore a building within the meaning of the section quoted by the learned Judge, is in my opinion a material alteration. I think that the expression "an alteration in a building" in section 178, sub-section (3), must include a part of such building. The definition in section 214 of a part of a building lays down what is to be read into this expression when it is used. But it is not inconsistent with a wall supplementary to or accessary to a verandah or balcony or house or other larger building, being in itself a building within the meaning of section 178. To raise a wall above the prescribed height of the building as provided by the section, would clearly be within the mischief aimed at by the section, and to say that it was only part of the building, when it was the only thing the raising of which mattered to anybody, and therefore could not be dealt with under the section, would reduce these provisions, which are made for the public interest, to an absurdity. Using the best judgment I can on the materials before me, it seems that the person in question, Nihal Muhammad, either rightly or wrongly did attempt technical breaches. On the other hand I agree with the Sessions Judge that the extent of his breach is very indistinctly made out. In questions of building plans, breaches of sanction and conduct in excess of rights conferred by or permitted by a public authority, the object is to enable the public authority to control streets and buildings under the best expert opinion, and it is not so important to inflict a fine upon the person who has committed a breach as it is to compel him to put his building back in accordance with the plan as sanctioned. Penalties must be provided and penalty sections must be used for bad cases where the individual has been contumacious and has palpably acted mala fide. But the penalty is only intended in terrorem and not to be used vindictively for technical offences. It seems to me therefore that the justice of the case will be met in this way. I reduce the penalty from Rs. 100 to Rs. 5, and I return the case to the Magistrate through the Sessions Judge with the intimation that this order has been passed without prejudice to the right of the Municipality, if so advised, to take such steps as are open to it under the Act, to compel Nihal Muhammad to put his building into conformity with the plan originally sanctioned. I regret that I am unable on this latter point to express a more definite opinion. I have had no legal assistance and I do not know whether the Act enables the Municipality to pull down the building or alter anything which has been erected in breach of the sanction. Such a power certainly exists under the Public Health Act and Metropolis Act in England, and I suspect that it must have been provided somewhere in India.

Cr. Rev. No. 396 of 1923, decided on the 17th July, 1923, against the order of the Sessions Judge, Ghazipur, dated the 2nd July, 1923.

Penal Code, S. 335—Attack on police attempting to arrest on suspicion of cognizable offence amounts to offence, though police were not in uniforms.

A complaint had been made by a certain girl that she had been raped by two persons named Mahesh and Ram Lal. The Sub-Inspector deputed certain police constables to arrest the accused. When these constables reached the place Mahesh and Ram Lal ran inside the house of Ujagar and when the constables wanted to enter that house to arrest them, they were stopped by the applicants who, armed with lathis, threatened to attack the constables, if they moved further towards the house.

Held: that though the constables were not armed with a warrant of arrest and were not in their uniforms they had sufficient authority under S. 54, Cr. P. C., to effect the arrest.

U. S. Bajpai—for the Applicants.

Judgment:—The accused applicants have been convicted of an offence under section 335, I. P. C., and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two months and a fine. They also have been convicted under section 147, I.P.C., and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two months each. It appears that a complaint had been made by a certain girl that she had been raped by two persons named Mahesh and Ram Lal. The Sub-Inspector went to hold an investigation and came to know that the two accused persons were present in their houses in the village. He deputed certain police constables to arrest the accused. When these constables reached the place Mahesh and Ram Lal ran inside the house of Ujagar, and when the constables wanted to enter that house to arrest them, they were stopped by the accused applicants who, armed with lathis, threatened to attack the constables, if they moved further towards the house. The contention here is that the constables were not armed with a warrant of arrest and were not in their uniforms, but even if they were not in uniforms and had no warrant of arrest with them they had sufficient authority under section 54, Cr.P.C., to arrest Mahesh and Ram Lal on the suspicion of having committed the offence with which the girl was charging them. In view of the circumstances there is no sufficient reason for interfering in revision. The application is rejected.

Cr. Rev. No. 407 of 1923, decided on the 15th August, 1923, from the order of the District Magistrate, Etawah, dated the 4th June, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 109 (a)—Neither refusal to give names, nor giving false name first and true name afterwards, nor a desire to cancel business amount to concealing presence.

The fact that the accused were seated at a village well does not necessarily justify any inference that they were taking precautions to conceal their presence; nor would the fact that they refused to give their names to an ordinary person justify such an inference.

There is a clear distinction between a request that the business which the accused were going to do should not be mentioned to any one and the request that the fact of their presence in the village should not be mentioned. The former does not necessarily imply that they were taking precautions to conceal their presence in the village.

If people are accosted by the police while going away from the village and give false names in the first instance and then give correct names afterwards, that fact by itself would not amount to taking precautions to conceal their presence with a view to committing an offence. Giving out false names is a concealment of the identity of the individuals concerned but it is not necessarily a concealment of their presence. [P. 203, C. 1.]

G. W. Dillon—for the Applicant.

The Asst. Govt. Advocate—for the Opposite party.

Judgment:—This is an application in revision from a conviction under section 109 (a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Both the applicants are residents of the city of Cawnpore and it is not disputed that they have some means of subsistence at that place. On the 7th of April, 1923, the Sub-Inspector of the circle received information that two strangers had arrived in his village Bharthana, and that they were concealing their presence in a house. When he proceeded towards the village his informer pointed out to him two men who were going away from the village across the field, and it is said that they were going by a footpath which is not much frequented. They were pursued and ultimately arrested.

The trying Magistrate relying on the evidence of two witnesses, Kailash Chander and Ganga, came to the conclusion that these accused persons were taking precautions to conceal their presence in that village with a view to committing an offence. This view has been accepted by the learned District Magistrate.

So far as the accused's intention to comit an offence during their visit to the village is concerned, on the evidence in this case there can be no manner of doubt. The evidence is that on a previous occasion they had performed "confidence tricks" on certain villagers, and it was also proved that on this occasion they got the witness Kailash Chander sent for and an offer was made to him to have Government notes doubled by a process professed to have been known to Sheo Prasad. Kailash however was not entrapped as he says that he replied that he would consult his partner before agreeing to get anything like that done. There can be no doubt that the accused had gone to this village with a view to cheat some unwary villager by means of a confidence trick, namely, of doubling notes. This however was not sufficient to convict them under the section named. The prosecution had further to show that they were taking precautions to conceal their presence in that locality. Now neither of the courts below have mentioned any facts which in my opinion would go to show that they were taking precautions to conceal their presence. As however the names of two witnesses relied upon had been named, I have had their evidence read over to me. So far as the evidence of Ganga is concerned it is simply this, that he saw both these accused sitting on a well near the village, and when questioned who they were, one of the accused appeared very angry and refused to give out their names, but the other accused simply stated that they were Thakurs. The fact that they were seated at a village well does not necessarily justify any inference that they were taking precautions to conceal their presence; nor would the fact that they refused to give their names to a person like Ganga justify such an inference. The evidence of Kailash is to the effect that when he was sent for through a man named Kallu, who is under police surveillance, he was taken inside the house in which the accused were, and before he was told what they would do he was asked to promise not to mention the business to any one else. It is not Kailash Chander's statement that he had been asked not to mention the fact of the presence of the accused in the village to any one. There is no other evidence on the record to show what precautions these accused took while they were in the village to conceal their presence. For instance, there is no evidence to show that they arrived secretly at night, or that they remained all the time indoors, or that they gave false names and addresses to the villagers—or any evidence of that kind. In my opinion there is a clear distinction between a request that Kailash should not mention the business which the accused were going to do to any one and the request that he should not mention the fact of their presence in the village. It is apparent that when the accused intended to commit the offence of cheating they would not like the business to be disclosed to the public generally. That does not necessarily imply that they were taking precautions to conceal their presence in the village.

There is one circumstance however which I must mention. In the course of the judgment the learned Magistrate has referred to the evidence of the Sub-Inspector to the effect that when he asked the accused while going along the fields to give their names, the names which they first gave were not their correct names. It has been contended on behalf of the Government that this amounted to concealing their presence with a view to commit an offence. I however think that this contention cannot prevail. There is no evidence that the accused had given false names when they were in the village. Further, when the accused were going away from the village, they then were not contemplating the committing of an offence, but were presumably running away in order to avoid arrest. If people are accosted by the police while going away from the village and give false names in the first instance and then give correct names afterwards, that fact by itself would not in my opinion amount to taking precautions to conceal their presence with a view to committing an offence. It is true that giving out false names is a concealment of the identity of the individuals concerned but is not necessarily a concealment of their presence. In any case as has already been noticed this happened after the accused had been chased by the police. At that time they were not going to the village to commit any offence but were really bolting away. Even therefore accepting this part of the evidence of the Sub-Inspector—though I must note that there was no such mention by him in the first report, I think that the accused cannot be bound over under section 109 (a).

I accordingly allow this application and set aside the order binding over the accused and direct that he be released. The security bond, if filed, will be cancelled.

Cr. Ref. No. 431 of 1923, decided 14th September, 1923, on reference made by the Sessions Judge, Ghazipur, dated the 21st July, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, Ss. 492 and 495—Prosecuting Inspector not appearing for prosecution, cannot withdraw the case.

In a criminal case a legal practitioner engaged by the complainant was permitted to conduct the prosecution, and the prosecuting inspector did not actually take part in the case. After the evidence of the complainant had been recorded a charge was framed and after that stage the accused made an application to the District Magistrate requesting that the case be withdrawn on certain terms. The file was sent for. When sending up the file the trying Magistrate addressed a note to the District Magistrate setting forth the facts of the case and winding up with the remark "I therefore would strongly recommend the application for your kind consideration because I do not believe that the accused committed the offence with intent to defraud." On reading the report of the trying Magistrate and perusing the file the District Magistrate accepted the apology of the accused persons as well as the offer of the sum of Rs. 4,500 for a charitable purpose. He ordered that the prosecuting inspector to withdraw the case. This order reached the trying Magistrate's Court before whom a further application was presented by the Court Inspector. On that application the trying Magistrate passed this order "The case has been withdrawn by the District Magistrate. The accused should be acquitted accordingly.

When a private complaint is filed and then the complainant is given permission to conduct the prosecution and be responsible for its conclusion, it is highly improper that after he has closed his evidence and the charge has been framed the prosecution should suddenly drop without even consulting him. Judgment:—This reference must be accepted. A private complaint was filed by Ram Gobind Singh against Lallu Singh and others and the case was being tried by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate concerned. The record shows that a legal practitioner engaged by the complainant was permitted by the trying Magistrate to conduct the prosecution case. In his explanation the District Magistrate has admitted that "it is true that the prosecuting inspector did not actually take part in the conduct of this case". After the evidence of the complainant had been recorded a charge was framed and it was after that stage that the accused persons made an application to the District Magistrate requesting that the case be withdrawn on certain terms. The file was sent for. When sending up the file the trying Magistrate addressed a note to the District Magistrate setting forth the facts of the case and winding up with the remark "I therefore would strongly recommend the application for your kind consideration because I do not believe that the accused committed the offence with intent to defraud." On reading the report of the trying Magistrate and perusing the file the District Magistrate seems to have been of opinion that the case was not one which should be dragged to its bitter end. He accepted the apology of the accused persons as well as the offer of the sum of Rs. 4,500 for a charitable purpose. He ordered that "the P. I. (that is the prosecuting inspector) will withdraw the case. Out of Rs. 4,500, Rs. 200 will be paid to the complainant to defray his expenses and to compensate him." This order reached the trying Magistrate's court before whom a further application was presented by the Court Inspector. On that application the trying Magistrate passed this order: "The case has been withdrawn by the District Magistrate. The accused should be acquitted accordingly."

These are the facts about which there can be no dispute whatsoever. The question for consideration is whether the order passed by the trying Magistrate was legal and whether in any case it ought to be set aside.

On behalf of the accused persons it has been contended that I must assume that the District Magistrate in sending for the file had actually recalled the case or withdrawn it from the court of the trying Magistrate and was himself seized of it and was enquiring into it or trying it and that it was in the course of such an enquiry or trial that he appointed the Court Inspector as a person to conduct the prosecution of this case within the meaning of section 495, Criminal Procedure Code, and that therefore the latter was duly authorised to withdraw the case. On the facts narrated by me such assumptions would be altogether unjustified.

There can be no doubt that section 492, sub-clause (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot apply. Under that section an officer appointed by the Governor General in Council or the Local Government to be called a public prosecutor would be such an officer. Court Inspectors of districts are not called by the Local Government as public prosecutors and I have no doubt that they have not been appointed as such. No notification suggesting anything to the contrary has been brought to my notice.

It is also obvious that section 492, sub-clause (2), can have no application. The Code which was in force when this order was passed was the old Code and as it then stood sub-clause (2) could only apply to a case which had been committed for trial to the court of sessions. It could not apply to a case which was actually pending before a Sub-Divisional Magistrate.

The learned Vakil for the accused has relied strongly on section 495, sub-clause (1), but I am of opinion that that also does not apply to the facts of this case. It cannot be disputed that after the complaint had been filed the Vakil engaged by the complainant was the person who had been permitted to conduct the prosecution case and it is not disputed that it was he who was engaged by him and who had been prosecuting the case. The Court Inspector, who never went anywhere near the court when this case was being tried and took no part in the trial and as regards whom there is no order on the record to conduct the prosecution is, in my opinion, not the person who under section 495, Criminal Procedure Code would have the powers of a public prosecutor. There is nothing on the record to show that the complainant or his vakils were at all consulted before the withdrawal was decided upon. As the learned Sessions Judge has remarked it does seem as if it was done over the heads of those persons.

The question therefore is whether under these circumstances the Court Inspector had authority even with the consent of the trying Magistrate to withdraw the case or not. I am of opinion that he had no such power. He was not the Public Prosecutor appointed by the Local Government and called as such nor was he in this case the person who was permitted to conduct the prosecution. Even assuming however that the Court Inspector with the consent of the trying Magistrate had power to withdraw this case and even without consulting the complainant and his vakil, I am of opinion that this is a case in which the order acquitting the accused persons must be set aside.

When a private complaint is filed and then the complainant is given permission to conduct the prosecution and be responsible for its conclusion, it does seem to me highly improper that after he has closed his evidence and the charge has been framed the prosecution should suddenly drop without even consulting him. If there was no case made out against the accused at all the accused were entitled to have a clear acquittal and not an acquittal on the payment of a price. The learned Vakil who appeared for the accused had strongly pressed that the opinion expressed by the trying Magistrate in his note to the District Magistrate shows that he was convinced that the conviction would not follow. Whether this is so or not I refrain from expressing an opinion. The opinion contained in that private note may or may not be that, but if it is a fact that the trying Magistrate was satisfied that there was no case against the accused he should have acquitted them at once.

In view of the observations made by me above I think it is necessary in the ends of justice that the order of acquittal should be set aside and the case sent back for disposal according to law. The case will, of course, proceed from the stage which it had reached before the order in question was passed.

Judgment :—This is an application in revision from a conviction under section 417 read with section 511 of the Indian Penal Code.

The facts as found by the courts below, about which in revision there cannot be much dispute, are as follows :—

Some five years ago the accused had borrowed Rs. 562-8-0 as loans on different occasions from the complainant. The complainant was asking for the repayment of the loan, and it is said that a serious demand was made for the return of this money last year. The accused is said to have made promises to repay. Some time before the alleged occurrence, it is also in evidence, that he sent a letter to the complainant saying that he would be sending money under a registered cover. On the 8th of March the accused admittedly sent a registered and insured cover to the address of the complainant. When this cover was received by the complainant he did not open it at the post office but took it home and opened it in the presence of a number of witnesses. On opening it he discovered that instead of five Government currency notes of Rs. 100 each, there were five Khilafat bonds, which are of course of no money value. On this he reported the matter to the post office, which was followed by an enquiry. During the enquiry the accused's statement was taken, as it is fully borne out by Ex. H, and in that statement he put forward the story that as a matter of fact he had sent Government currency notes and not the Khilafat bonds.

He was put on his trial and the charge framed against him was worded as follows : that he on the 8th of March, 1923, at Moradabad cheated Krishen Das Harrumal by dishonestly inducing them to receive and accept the insured letter Ex. H containing Islamic Unity Bonds which they would not have accepted if they were not so misled and caused them damage.

It is to be noted that there was no charge of any attempt to cheat the postal authorities. The trying Magistrate convicted the accused under section 417, but on appeal that conviction was altered to one under section 417, read with section 511, that is to say an attempt to cheat.

The question for consideration in this revision is whether on the facts stated above the accused has been rightly convicted of the offence of attempting to cheat.

The learned Sessions Judge has also sent up a reference recommending that the sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 200 should be enhanced. In his judgment he has relied on the decision of a case in the Patna High Court, decided by a Division Bench of that Court, namely, the case of Sadho Lal v. Emperor (1). The facts of that case I must say were very much similar to the facts of this case, and the learned Judges of the Patna High Court upheld the conviction under section 417 read with section 511.

It is obvious that no question of an offence of any actual cheating having been committed arises in this case. Under section 415 of the Indian Penal Code mere deceiving a person fraudulently is not sufficient unless that deception is coupled with dishonestly inducing that person to deliver any property to any person, or to consent that any person shall retain any property, or intentionally induce the person so deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit to do if he were not so deceived, and which act or omission is likely to cause damage or harm to that person. It is conceded that in the present case no offence of cheating was committed.

I have then to see whether the accused can be convicted of an attempt to cheat. There can be no doubt that the sending of these worthless bonds was not by way of a mere joke. In his statement before the postal authorities, as well as in his defence at the trial, the accused stuck to his story that he had in fact sent Government currency notes. In cases of this kind one may very well imagine that the object is to cheat the postal authorities and try to recover the amount for which the contents were said to have been insured. But that is not the offence with which the accused has been charged. I may therefore leave that possibility entirely out of account.

The question to be answered is whether the accused did attempt to cheat the complainant, and if so in what way. It cannot be imagined that the accused expected that on the receipt of these false notes the complainant would be induced either to give a valid discharge of his debt, or to grant him any receipt, or to deliver any property to him, or to consent to retaining any property.

The point to be further considered is whether the object was not to induce the complainant to do or omit to do anything which he would not have done or omitted to do. The only possible suggestion that has been made, and that can be made, is that by these means of fraud the accused hoped that when a suit for recovery of the debt was instituted, he would have in substance some sort of evidence to bolster up a defence that the debt had been discharged. I cannot see how on receipt of these false bonds the complainant would have been prevented from bringing a suit altogether. The mere fact that a cover insured for a certain amount is sent raises no presumption in law that that cover contains the necessary amount of Government currency notes. It is therefore not easily conceivable what is the thing which the complainant would have done or omitted to do if the fraud contemplated by the accused had succeeded. The only thing that can be said is that the accused imagined that he would have had some sort of a proof that the debt had been paid off.

If however that be the view, the offence that the accused committed was an attempt to cause a circumstance to exist, intending that such circumstance may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding or proceeding taken by law before a public servant or before an arbitrator, and such circumstance so appearing in evidence, may cause a person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion upon the evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion on any point material to the result of the proceeding. Then the offence would be an attempt to fabricate false evidence within the meaning of section 192 of the Indian Penal Code. The accused however has not been charged with any such offence.

The judgment of the Patna High Court referred to by the learned Sessions Judge does not clearly set forth the grounds on which the learned Judges thought that the case fell under section 417 read with section 511. In the present case I am of opinion that it is impossible to say that the complainant would have been induced to do a thing, or omit to do a thing in consequence of what was done by the accused.

In this view of the matter I hold that no offence under section 417 read with section 511 was committed. Of course I do not mean to say that no offence of any kind whatsoever was committed. I accordingly allow his application, set aside the conviction and sentence passed on the applicant and acquit him of the offence with which he was charged. He should be released at once, and the fine if paid be refunded.

Cr. App. No. 446 of 1923, decided on 17th July, 1923, against the order of the Addl. Sessions Judge, Aligarh, dated 18th April, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 154 — Admission of guilt is not first information,

A statement made by the accused implicating himself and others cannot be called 'first information report' so far as he is covered.

Saila Nath Mukherji—for Appellants.

The Government Pleader—for Crown.

Judgment.:—In this case six men have been convicted of the offence of making preparation for a dacoity and sentenced to varying terms of imprisonment of some severity. The first two Subedar and Ram Chander have already been convicted of a dacoity and sentenced to eight years' imprisonment, which conviction and sentence has been confirmed by me in the connected case. I have no doubt whatever as to the guilt of all the appellants. The same approver Narain who gave evidence in the connected case has also given evidence in this case.

I should not therefore interfere, or say anything about the details of the case, if it were not for one unfortunate circumstance in the way in which the learned Judge has dealt with one feature in the evidence. A technical point has been argued on behalf of the appellants, and in my opinion it is a good one. With regard to some of the accused it happens to possess little or no importance. I will deal with the way in which it affects the case of the appellants in detail in a moment. But it is a point of general importance affecting other accused, and a point upon which the learned Judge ought never to have made a mistake at all. The point is really an elementary one. I have no doubt the learned Judge is quite familiar with sections 25, 26 and 27 of the Evidence Act, but the complaint against his judgment is that he has misapplied the sections. The point arises in this way. The approver and one of the appellants were arrested practically redhanded. They made statements to the officer who arrested them involving admissions of guilt. They went further and gave a list of the other members of the gang. Thereupon the officer made a report in writing to his superior, containing the information which he had received, including the names of those other persons received from the two men arrested. Somehow or other, the learned Judge has described this police report, which is merely the report of a confession, as "the first information report." Now the first information report is a well-known technical description of a report under section 154, Criminal Procedure Code, giving first information of a cognizable crime. This is usually made by the complainant, or by some one on his behalf. The language is inapplicable to a statement made by the accused. The novelty of a statement by an accused person being called the first information report was to me so strange, that when counsel for the appellants addressed his argument to me attacking the Judge's use of the first information report, I took no notice of the argument. The learned Judge realized that he was dealing with a confession, but he momentarily failed to appreciate that the document itself was inadmissible, and that the only way in which the information relied upon could be used was by section 27. That is to say, with regard to the other accused, the officer giving evidence might say: "I arrested them in consequence of information received from Narain and Thakuri. When I arrested them they made a statement to me which caused me to arrest these people". The use which can legitimately be made of such information is merely this, that when direct evidence is given against the accused at the trial and there was evidence against the accused, it is open to the defence to check such evidence by asking whether the name of a particular accused was mentioned or not at the time. So that it becomes evidence which may be used to test the consistency of an approver's story, and at any rate information which leads to the discovery of the accused in question. It is no evidence of the guilt of the accused, and the mischief into which the learned Judge has fallen and which has been rightly complained of, is that he has used it throughout as evidence of guilt. In discussing the individual cases he consistently says in the forefront of the points against the individual accused, that "his name occurs in the first report," and he acquits some because their names do not appear in the first report, and in his general discussion in the judgment he says that "the first information report in question is of the greatest importance". As regards four of the accused I am quite satisfied that there was abundant evidence without this inadmissible document. Khuba was arrested in the village, where several of the dacoits came from, along with Chiranji who was armed with a loaded weapon. He has been identified as being with other members of the gang in two different places by three witnesses. He unfortunately has a squint. I do not understand why a squint should be regarded as a bar to a legitimate identification. It seems to me rather an aid than otherwise. It is quite true that if there is a dishonest investigation an Inspector might tell the witnesses that one of the persons he wanted identified had a squint, and it might be well, if there are many persons awaiting trial with this abnormality, that some of them might be put amongst the crowd for identification. But a man might just as well object to an identification because he happens to wear a black moustache. People with remarkable features take that risk when they take up an evil course. Chiranji has been sworn to by the approver, and as the judge says his arrest with a loaded pistol is an incriminating fact against him, and he has been identified by some of the witnesses. Umrai was with the two appellants whom I have just mentioned and he has also been identified. Thakuri was with Narain when they were both arrested hiding soon after day-break with a loaded gun and ammunition. In the case of those four I have no hesitation in confirming their conviction and sentences. The case of Ram Chander and Subedar is not quite so simple. Omitting the objectionable report, there is only the identification of witnesses who have made a fair proportion of mistakes, and if this was the only thing against them, I should have felt some difficulty in deciding whether I ought not to order a new trial. But I propose to take a short and common sense course which cannot possibly prejudice the accused. They have already received 8 years for dacoity. If I had the power I would make the sentence in this case run concurrently. After the 8 years their power for mischief will be very much diminished and it seems an adequate sentence. They must have been guilty of some preparation, if not this preparation, and I therefore uphold this conviction and having no jurisdiction to order the sentence to run concurrently, I reduce the sentence to one of one day to date from the judgment in the sessions trial. I have taken the pains which I have done to deal with this question, because I thought it right that the attention of the Sessions Judge should be drawn to the point, and that he should realise that in a case of this kind, if the other evidence or other circumstances have raised a doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence in the case, the time and trouble spent in this case, would have been thrown away because I should have had to order a new trial. Subject to the above modifications the appeals are dismissed.

Cr. Rev. No. 454 of 1923, decided on the 18th September, 1923, from the order of the Sessions Judge, Ghazipur, dated 4th August, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code (1923), S. 345 (5-A)—Compounding of offence is allowed in revision.

Under the new Code, S. 345, sub-clause (5-A), a High Court acting in the exercise of its powers of revision under S. 439, may allow any person to compound any offence which he is competent to compound under this section and under Sch. 2, Chapter V, an offence under S. 420, Penal Code, is made compoundable by the new Code.

G. W. Dillon and S. N. Verma—for Applicant.

Judgment:—In this revision an application has been filed on behalf of the original complainant supported by an affidavit, praying that permission be granted to compound his case.

The complainant had filed a complaint against the accused on the allegation that the latter had cheated him in respect of a sum of Rs. 210, which had been paid by the complainant for the purchase of certain shares of the Allahabad Tannery, Ltd. The accused was convicted by the trial court and that conviction was upheld on appeal. The sentence passed on him was one of rigorous imprisonment for six months and a fine of Rs. 100. An application for revision was filed on behalf of the accused on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence on the record to prove his guilt. Acting under the revisional powers of this Court I sent for the record and the revision is still pending.

In the affidavit filed in this Court to-day the complainant admits that he has received Rs. 210, of which it has been alleged that he has been cheated. In his application which has also been verified in court by him he is agreeable to compromise the matter and allow the case to be compounded.

Under the new Code of Criminal Procedure, section 345, sub-clause (5-A), a High Court, acting in the exercise of its powers of revision under section 439, may allow any person to compound any offence which he is competent to compound under this section and under Sch. 2, Chapter V, an offence under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code is now made compoundable.

As the amount in question was a small sum which has been received in full by the complainant and he is ready and willing to compound the matter I grant the necessary permission.

As a result, the composition of the offence, mentioned above, shall have the effect of the acquittal of the accused; the fine if paid must be refunded and the accused released forthwith so far as this case is concerned.

Case allowed to be compounded.

Cr. Rev. No. 459 of 1923, decided on the 8th October, 1923, from the order of the Sessions Judge, Cawnpore, dated 24th July, 1923.

Penal Code, S. 420—Getting money without a request or inducement to that effect, is no offence.

The applicant Sarada Saran was a temporary clerk at Lucknow, and took leave from the 23rd January 1923, till the 31st of January of that year. While he was on casual leave he went to Cawnpore, and was appointed a permanent head clerk of the Cawnpore Cantonments by a temporary Cantonment Magistrate. He applied to the Lucknow authorities for an extension of his leave but originally this leave was not granted. His casual leave expired on the 31st January, 1923. On the 2nd of February 1923, he had been informed that he was ineligible under the rules for a permanent appointment. Captain Pocock, told the accused that he could not consider his retention in the Cantonment Magistrate's office, whereon the accused informed him that he had resigned his post in the Military Accounts Department, and that it would entail considerable loss to him if he did not retain him. He even offered to accept the position of an apprentice clerk. Captain Pocock could not retain him in his office, and so he paid him a month's pay in lieu of notice amounting to Rs. 145. The accused took the pay in lieu of notice and went back to Lucknow. He then got his leave extended and rejoined on the 5th of February. He again drew his pay at Lucknow, where the accused made it clear that he had already drawn his pay for the month at Cawnpore and he would have to refund one of the two sums.

Held, that it is very difficult to say that the accused induced Captain Pocock to pay him Rs. 145. [P. 210, C. 1.]

Gulzari Lal and R. N. Prasad—for Applicant.

The Asst. Govt. Advocate—for the Crown.

Judgment:—This is a criminal revision from a conviction under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code.

The applicant Sarda Saran was a temporary clerk at Lucknow, and took leave from the 23rd of January, 1923, till the 31st of January of that year. While he was on casual leave he went to Cawnpore and was appointed a permanent Head clerk of the Cawnpore Cantonments by a temporary Cantonment Magistrate. He applied to the Lucknow authorities for an extension of his leave but originally this leave was not granted. It is not disputed that his casual leave expired on the 31st of January, 1923. On the 2nd of February, 1923, he had been informed that he was ineligible under the rules for a permanent appointment.

Captain Pocock, prosecution witness No. 3, states that he told the accused that he could not consider his retention in the Cantonment Magistrate's office, whereon the accused informed him that he had resigned his post in the Military Accounts Department, and that it would entail considerable loss to him if he did not retain him. He even offered to accept the position of an apprentice clerk. The witness goes on to say that as he could not retain him in his office, he thought it fit and proper to give him a month's pay in lieu of notice, and adds that he was induced to do so on account of the representation made to him by the accused.

The accused took the pay in lieu of notice and went back to Lucknow. It is stated that he then got his leave extended and rejoined on the 5th of February. He again drew his pay at Lucknow but the clerk who paid him has stated that on receipt of it the accused made it clear that he had already drawn his pay for the month at Cawnpore and he would have to refund one of the two sums.

On these facts the accused has been convicted of the offence of cheating.

Cheating is defined in section 415 of the Indian Penal Code as being committed when by deceiving any person fraudulently or dishonestly one induces the person so deceived to deliver any property, etc., and which act causes damage.

There can be no doubt that deception was practised on Captain Pocock. Whether it was intentional or not is a matter which was to some extent in dispute, it being suggested on behalf of the accused that as he had overstayed his leave he honestly believed that he had lost his appointment. The question however still remains whether the accused by deceiving Captain Pocock, induced him to pay him the salary for February in lieu of notice. The charge as framed was that he had cheated Captain Pocock and thereby dishonesly induced him to give him (the accused) one month's pay in lieu of one month's notice, while he was actually drawing pay for that period from another Government department.

Captain Pocock's statement however makes it clear, and the learned Sessions Judge himself has conceded that admittedly the accused did not ask Captain Pocock to give him the sum of Rs. 145 or for the matter of that any other sum. Captain Pocock's own statement is that the accused requested that he be retained, and even offered to accept the position of an apprentice clerk. It is manifest therefore that the statement, if it was knowingly made by the accused, was made with the object of inducing Captain Pocock to retain him in service, or at any rate to accept him as an apprentice clerk. There is nothing to show that at that time the accused even suggested that any compensation should be paid to him.

The question therefore is whether it can be said that the accused by false representation, which he made with the intention of securing his retention as Head Clerk or his employment as an apprentice, can be said to have induced Captain Pocock to pay him Rs. 145, simply because the Captain on that statement thought that that was the most fit and proper thing to do.

The case is certainly not free from difficulty.

In my opinion in order to convict a person for cheating, it is necessary to show that there is a proximate connection between deception practised on the complainant, and his being induced to part with some property. If the connection is too remote, or very indirect, it is difficult to see that the offence of cheating would be complete. I have therefore to see whether the circumstances of this case are such as to make it clear without any reasonable doubt that the payment of one month's salary in lieu of notice was proximately connected with the false representation made by the accused. There is no doubt that Captain Pocock does say that he would not have made the payments unless he had been told that the accused had lost his appointment.

The other matter which must have influenced Captain Pocock's mind was the circumstance of the accused's sudden dismissal without previous notice. The accused certainly was guilty of an attempt to cheat Captain Pocock in this way, that he deceived Captain Pocock and thereby dishonestly attempted to induce him to retain the accused in his service and thus do an act which he might not otherwise have done. But the accused has unfortunately not been charged with that offence.

What I have to see is whether he can be convicted of having induced Captain Pocock to pay him Rs. 145, in lieu of notice. On the evidence of Captain Pocock himself it is clear that the accused in no way suggested to him that he should be paid any compensation. He certainly did not ask him to pay any sum. All that he did was to request him to retain him in service as permanent Head Clerk, or even as apprentice clerk. Can it therefore be said that the accused induced Captain Pocock to pay him Rs. 145? I think the case is just on the border line, and it is very difficult to say that the accused induced Captain Pocock to pay him Rs. 145. I am far from saying that Captain Pocock would have paid the sum even if he had not been told by the accused that he (the latter) had lost his appointment.

I accordingly allow this application, set aside the conviction and sentence passed on the accused and discharge him. He should be released forthwith. The fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Cr. Ref. No. 482 of 1923, decided on the 14th September, 1923, made by the Sessions Judge, Budaun, dated 10th August, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 233—Theft and beating after an interval, to prevent complainant from lodging complaint, are distinct offences.

Sharfuddin and Nanhe accused were detected while stealing the crop of the complainant Chiddu Chamar, who objected to the theft and was compelled to run away to his house. After this, Sharfuddin and Nanhe hearing that the complainant intended to go to the police station to make a report, went along with the other persons to the complainant's chaupal and there caused hurt to Chiddu, and grievous hurt to his father Nanhe.

Held: that the two offences were obviously quite distinct and separate, and there was also an interval of time between their commission. Held further: that they were not so connected together as to form the same transaction.

The parties were not represented.

Judgment:—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of Budaun. The accused persons were tried jointly for offences under sections 379, 147 and 325 read with section 149 of the Indian Penal Code. They were convicted by the trying Magistrate and their convictions were upheld by the appellate court.

An application for revision was presented on behalf of the accused persons to the court of the Sessions Judge, and the legality of the joint trial was questioned.

The facts as found so far are that Sharfuddin and Nanhe accused were detected while stealing the crop of the complainant Chiddu Chamar, who objected to the theft and was compelled to run away to his house. After this Sharfuddin and Nanhe hearing that the complainant intended to go the police station to make a report, went along with the other persons to the complainant's chaupal and there caused hurt to Chiddu, and grievous hurt to his father Nanhe. The two offences were obviously quite distinct and separate, and there was also an interval of time between their commission. By no stretch of language can it be said that these offences were of the same time, nor can it be said that they were so connected together as to form the same transaction.

In this view of the matter I agree with the learned Sessions Judge that a joint trial was illegal. It was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case reported in 25 Madras 61 that such non-compliance with the provisions of section 233 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, was not merely an irregularity but an illegality.

The accused were not satisfied with the joint trial and themselves asked the learned Sessions Judge to set aside the orders on the ground of the illegality of the joint trial.

I accept the reference, and set aside the convictions of the accused persons, and direct that the accused be tried de novo of the offences charged, and the offence of theft be tried separately from that falling under sections 147, 325 and 149. The District Magistrate will send the case to another Magistrate for trial.

Let the record be returned.

Cr. Ref. No. 484 of 1923, decided on the 4th October, 1923, by the Addl. Sessions Judge, Aligarh, dated 16th August, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 522—Appellate Court cannot pass order under, if trial Court has passed none—But under new Code, High Court can.

An appellate Court has no power to pass an order under S. 522 if the trial Court had made no order at all. (39 Cal. 1050 and 48 I. C. 510, Appl.)

But under the new Code brought into effect on the 1st September last the High Court under S. 522 sub clause (3) has in a reference or revision, power to make an order of restoration even though no such order might have been made by the trial or appellate Court. [P. 213, C. 1.]

The parties were not represented.

Judgment:—This is a reference by the learned Additional Sessions Judge of Aligarh. It has been found by the courts below that Sia Ram, complainant was put in possession of the southern portion of the house in dispute by the Civil Court Amin on the 10th of December, 1922, in pursuance of an appellate order of the Civil Court. In spite of the possession having been given to Sia Ram as found by the courts below the accused again took possession of the house forcibly on the 29th of December, 1922. It has been found that force was used and Sia Ram was intimidated and was prevented from getting into the house. Accordingly the accused have been convicted of the offence under section 448 of the Indian Penal Code and there is no question of interference with that order.

The trial court however omitted to pass any order under section 522, Criminal Procedure Code. The appellate court after upholding the conviction and sentence directed that the trying Magistrate should restore rightful person, i.e., Sia Ram again into possession under section 522, Criminal Procedure Code. The learned Additional Sessions Judge has referred this case to the High Court with a recommendation that the latter portion of the order of the appellate court was ultra vires and should set aside. Under the old Code of Criminal Procedure there was considerable doubt as to whether an appellate court had power to pass an order under section 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure where a trial court had made no order at all. Had some order been passed by the trial court under section 522, Criminal Procedure Code, then the appellate court acting under section 423, sub-clause (d) of the Criminal Procedure Code had power to make any amendment or any consequential or incidental order that might be just or proper and thus to interfere with that order. Where however the trial court had not made any order under section 522, Criminal Procedure Code, it was certainly very doubtful whether the interference by the appellate court could come within the expression "amendment or any consequential or incidental order that may be just and proper." In the case of Bhagat Shaha v. Sadique Ostagar (1), followed in 48 I.C. 510, it was held that the appellate court had no jurisdiction to make an order restoring possession of immoveable property where the trial court had not made any order at all. These cases are in no way inconsistent with the rule of law laid down in 27 All. 415 where a trying Magistrate had himself made an order. I therefore agree with the view of the learned Additional Sessions Judge that the appellate court had in this case no jurisdiction to make the order in question.

The case however is a very gross one and in the absence of a restoration of possession the complainant will be forced to institute fresh proceedings in a Civil Court, soon after a successful litigation. This is a fit case therefore for interference by this Court.

Under the new Code of Criminal Procedure (as modified and brought into effect on the 1st of September last) the High Court under section 522, sub-clause (3), (1) (1912) 39 Cal. 1050=16 C.W.N. 811=13 Cr. L.J. 608=16 I.C. 176.

Criminal Procedure Code has in a reference or revision power to make an order even though no such order might have been made by the trial or appellate court.

Accordingly I set aside that portion of the appellate court's order which directed restoration of possession to the complainant and in place of it make a fresh order directing restoration of possession of that portion of the house which had been delivered over to the complainant in pursuance of the Civil Court decree.

Cr. Ref. No. 485 of 1923, decided on 4th October, 1923, ref. made by the Addl. Sessions Judge, Aligarh, dated 14th August, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 520—Appellate Court cannot direct restoration, where trial Court has not.

One Onkar filed a complaint under S. 506 against the three accused to the effect that they were demanding under threats the restoration of certain Bahis which were in the complainant's possession. These Bahis had been in the possession of Onkar for the last 10 or 11 years but the trying Magistrates found that they really belonged to two of the accused. They however, passed no order with regard to the restoration of the Bahis but added that if they wanted to get them back they should seek their remedy in a proper Court. In an appeal the Appellate Court directed that the Bahis be returned to the accused.

Held: that the offence of criminal intimidation was complete but the order of restoration was bad.

The parties were not represented.

Judgment:—This is a reference by the Additional Sessions Judge of Aligarh.

Onkar, the complainant, filed a complaint under sections 506 of the Indian Penal Code and 107 Criminal Procedure Code against the three accused to the effect that they were demanding under threats the restoration of certain Bahis which were in the complainant's possession. It has been found that these Bahis had been in the possession of Onkar for the last 10 or 11 years but the trying Magistrates found that they really belonged to two of the accused, Musammat Sabitri and Musammat Deoki. They acquitted the two Musammats but convicted the third accused Nanney. They however passed no order with regard to the restoration of the Bahis to the Musammats but added that if they wanted to get them back they should seek their remedy in a proper court.

In an appeal by Nanney, the appellate court, although it did not differ from the finding that the Bahis had been in the possession of Onkar for 11 or 12 years and although it upheld the conviction of Nanney, directed that the Bahis be returned to Musammats Sabitri and Deoki.

There can be no doubt that an appellate court under section 520, Criminal Procedure Code has power to modify, alter or annul an order made under section 517 or make any further orders that may be just. At the same time there can also be no doubt that the order of the trying Magistrates was under the circumstances quite proper.

It was Onkar who had been in possession of these Bahis for 10 or 11 years who complained that the accused persons were threatening him. Although the object of the threat was obviously to obtain possession of the Bahis nevertheless the offence of criminal intimidation was complete even though the accused did not have access to the articles in question. Their convictions could also have been upheld if the Bahis did not really belong to the accused. So long as it was clear that the complainant had been in possession of these Bahis for 10 or 11 years, the question of title need not have been gone into by the criminal courts. That question has, as pointed out by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, become a complicated one and involves the examination of the further questions whether Gopi Nath did or did not purchase the Bahis at an auction-sale and whether the sale to Onkar was a bona fide one or not. These questions were very properly left to be determined by the Civil Court.

I therefor accept this reference and set aside that part of the order of the appellate court which directed that the Bahis be made over to the two Musammats. The Bahis if still in the custody of the court should be returned to Onkar from whose possession they have come.

Cr. Ref. No. 492 of 1923, decided on the 4th October, 1923, ref. made by the Sessions Judge, Farrukhabad, dated 11th August, 1923.

Penal Code, S. 272—Mixing pig's fat in ghee for sale is no offence under this section.

Mixing of pig's fat with ghee and selling the mixture would be noxious to the religious and social feelings of both Hindus and Mahomedans but such an act would not come within the meaning of the expression 'noxious as food' which occure in S. 272. The word "noxious" had it stood by itself, might have had a wider meaning.

The parties were not represented.

Judgment:—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of Farrukhabad. The accused persons were convicted in a summary trial and therefore the record is very meagre. All that appears from the notes of evidence made by the trying Magistrate is that the accused persons were taking out pig's fat and mixing it with ghee which they ordinarily sell. There was no direct evidence that the accused intended to sell the mixture although this might be inferred from the circumstance that they do sell ghee. They have been convicted under section 272 of the Indian Penal Code for adulterating an article of food so as to make such article noxious as food intending to sell it as food or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold as such. It is true that the mixing of pig's fat with ghee and selling the mixture would be noxious to the religious and social feelings of both Hindus and Mohamedans but I am of opinion that such an act would not come within the meaning of the expression 'noxious as food' which occurs in section 272, Indian Penal Code. That expression obviously means unwholesome as food or injurious to health and not repugnant to one's feelings. The word 'noxious' had it stood by itself, might have had a wider meaning, but what I have to consider is the expression 'noxious as food' and not merely noxious.

I therefore think that the conviction under section 272 of the Indian Penal Code was not justified. Of course if the accused had sold the mixture or attempted to sell it on the pretence that it was pure ghee they would have been guilty of quite a different offence, that is to say of cheating or attempt to cheat. I accordingly accept this reference and set aside the conviction of the accused, acquit them of the offence charged and direct that they be released.

Where the discovery of the articles showing the guilt of the accused and found at the search, is proved by direct evidence, any irregularity or illegality in the search can neither vitiate the trial nor affect a conviction. (11 A.L.J. 442, Foll.) [P. 215, C. 1.]

S. B. Johri—for the Applicant.

Judgment:—This was a clear case and the only question was whether the accused was in possession of cocaine and used to sell it in his house. On search being made four Government currency notes which had been previously marked by the Excise Inspector and had been handed over to an informer in order to be paid for cocaine as purchase price were actually discovered in a locked box in the house of which the accused had the key. Furthermore, the search witnesses say that as soon as the party raided the house the accused went inside a room and tried to hold up the door against the police but it was forced open. He was also seen going to a table in a corner of a room and picking up some packets which he hurriedly put in his mouth. His mouth was forced open by a police constable and some pieces of paper were taken out but the powder had been swallowed by him. Then the evidence is that certain scales and a knife were discovered which when later on examined by the Chemical Examiner were found to have traces of cocaine on them. The evidence of Baldeo Prasad as well as the informer is to the effect that it was the accused who had sold the packet to the informer and which was ultimately found to contain cocaine. All these facts have been found by both the courts below against the accused. It is impossible for me to go behind these findings and to say that these witnesses should not have been believed. It has been strongly urged before me that the search that was made was without a legal warrant and was illegal and it is then argued that that vitiates the whole trial. I am unable to agree with this contention. There is no question of drawing any legal presumptions. The discovery of the articles mentioned above is proved by direct evidence. Any irregularity or illegality in the search can neither vitiate the trial nor affect a conviction—vide the case reported in 11 A. L. J. 442. In face of the positive evidence it cannot be said that the accused has in any way been prejudiced by any irregular search. I reject the application.

Cr. Ref. No. 559 of 1923, decided on the 26th October, 1923, ref. by the District Magistrate, Agra, dated 3rd October, 1923.

Arms Act (XI of 1878), S. 4—Empty cartridges are ammunition.

Empty cartridges come within the definition of ammunition in S. 4 of the Arms Act. (32 All. 152, Foll.)

The parties were not represented.

FACTS:—In this case the accused Aladin was convicted under section 19 (f) of Act XI of 1878 (Arms Act) for being in possession of three empty cartridge cases without licence and was sentenced to six weeks rigorous imprisonment. The defence put forward by the accused was that he had picked them up on the road without knowing what they were.

The District Magistrate taking the view that empty cartridges like these do not come within the definition of ammunition as given in paragraph 4 of the Act referred the case to the Hon'ble High Court. He relied on a case of the Punjab Chief Court Jawa Khan v. K.E., No. 20 Punjab Record 1890.

The Reference first came up before Mr. Justice Sulaiman who referred it to a Bench of two Judges.

Judgment:—This is a reference by the learned District Magistrate of Agra recommending that the conviction of Aladin under section 19 (f) of the Arms Act be quashed. Aladin was prosecuted for having in his possession three empty cartridge cases. He was convicted and sentenced by the Deputy Magistrate to six weeks' rigorous imprisonment.

It seems to us that empty cartridges come within the definition of ammunition in section 4 of the Act, and we follow the view laid down by a learned Judge of this Court in Baldeo Singh v. King-Emperor (1). In our opinion therefore the conviction was right. We think however that the sentence was altogether excessive. In our opinion a fine would have been more appropriate than a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for this offence. As the accused has already served some part of his term we alter the sentence to the term already served. As he is on bail he need not surrender. Let the papers be returned.

Conviction upheld.

Cr. App. No. 619 of 1923, decided on the 11th August, 1923, from the order of the Sessions Judge, Moradabad, dated 4th July, 1923.

Penal Code, S. 328—Administering Dhatura to cause a girl to fall in love with accused is an offence where delirium was caused.

The accused a boy of about 16 years of age became infatuated with a girl Mt. Chando and began to make advances to her and did various tricks to make her inclined towards him. Ultimately he persuaded Kanhaiya, a boy of about 12 years of age to take five Peras one of which contained dhatura in order that they might be given to Mt. Chando and other members of her family. Kanhaiya did distribute these peras to various people including Mt. Chando. All the persons who took these peras showed symptoms of poisoning, and Mt. Chando was in a state of delirium.

Held: that the intention to persuade Mt. Chando by some mysterious means or other to fall in love with him, cannot be said to be an intention to commit or facilitate the commission of any offence. But dhatura is a very common drug, and it is well known that it is poisonous and a person of the age of the accused must be presumed to know that such a drug is poisonous. [P. 217, C. 1.]

Held further: that if a person by the administration of dhatura is thrown into a delirium, with the possible risk of falling into coma and becoming unconscious for the time being, both bodily pain and infirmity are caused and therefore the accused was guilty under S. 328. [P. 217, C. 1.]

G. W. Dillon—for Appellant.

The Govt. Pleader—for the Crown.

Judgment:—This is an appeal from a conviction under section 328 of the Indian Penal Code, the accused having been charged with poisoning with dhatura a number of persons including one Musammat Chando, who is a girl of about 12 years. The accused is about 16 years of age, and it is the prosecution case that he became infatuated with the girl Musammat Chando and began to make advances to her and did various tricks to make her inclined towards him. It is said that he first got her brother Narain to take a cake of soap and crochet needle and ten annas that Musammat Chando might knit him something. He also asked her brother to get him some earth from below her left foot. He then tried to get some sweets sent to her through one Manohar, who refused to take them. Ultimately he persuaded Kanhaiya, a boy of about 12 years of age to take five peras, one of which is said to have contained dhatura, in order that they might be given to Musammat Chando and other members of her family. There can be no doubt that Kanhaiya did distribute these peras to various people, including Musammat Chando. All the persons who took these peras showed symptoms of poisoning. This was in the evening of the 1st of May, 1923. A private practitioner Dr. Dikshit was sent for about 9-15 p. m., and he noticed that Musammat Chando was in a state of delirium. She was picking at the cot and drawing imaginary threads from her fingers. Shanti, a boy, was in a condition of collapse and his heart was failing. The condition of the children of the tailor was also bad. The doctor came to the conclusion that all that was the effect of the dhatura poisoning, particularly as he noticed the pupils of these people dilated. At about 3-30 a. m., that night three of these persons were sent to the hospital and were there examined by the medical officer in charge. He found the pupils of Musammat Chando dilated and her condition delirious. The pupils of two others were also found dilated, one of whom, was slightly unconscious but the other person was in his senses. This doctor also came to the conclusion that these persons showed signs of dhatura poisoning. None of these doctors were able to see any vomit or stools and they could not give any more definite opinion.

The broad facts of the case connot be much disputed. There is no doubt that the appellant did become infatuated with the girl and did try various tricks to make her favourably inclined towards him. It is the previous conduct of the accused that has made the learned Sessions Judge come to the finding that there was really no "intention" on the part of the appellant to cause any hurt to either of the persons to whom peras were given. The accused had pleaded an alibi but led no evidence to substantiate that plea. The evidence given by Kanhaiya Lal, supported by the evidence of halwai who sold the peras to the accused, as well as of Piarey Lal, a passer-by who saw him purchase them and handing them over to Kanhaiya Lal, who was standing close to the confectioner's shop, conclusively establishes that the accused had handed over peras to Kanhaiya Lal, which were distributed to the persons already mentioned.

On behalf of the appellant it has been argued very strenuously that he must have been under a mistaken belief that these peras would act as a love philtre, and his only object in making Mussamat Chando eat them was to make her love him.

It is also suggested that as Kanhaiya Lal is the son of a local hakim, it is highly probable that it was he who had procured this drug. Whether Kanhaiya Lal was in the conspiracy, or not, there can in my opinion be no doubt that the accused must have intended to administer some specific drug which he believed would act as a love philtre.

The medical evidence proves that this drug was dhatura. The question then is whether under the circumstances it can be inferred that the accused knew the nature of the drug which was going to be administered.

As I agree with the finding of the learned Sessions Judge that there was really no intention on the part of the accused to cause hurt to any person, it is clear that the offence cannot fall within the first portion of section 328 of the Indian Penal Code. I am also of opinion that the intention to persuade Musammat Chando by some mysterious means or other to fall in love with him, cannot be said to be an intention to commit or facilitate the commission of any offence. In this view the act cannot fall within the second portion of that section either.

The question remains whether it can be said that the accused knew it to be likely that he will thereby cause hurt to any of those persons. I find it impossible to believe that Kanhaiya Lal would have mixed up this drug in the peras without informing the accused what drug it was. Even if Kanhaiya Lal knew all about it, there can in my mind be no doubt that the accused also knew the nature of the drug. I find it impossible to conjecture, or assume, that the drug which the accused wanted to put in the peras, was a drug other than the one which the doctors say must have been. If it was sought to be shown that a mistake had been made, and owing to such mistake a wrong drug had been mixed up, it was the duty of the accused to show it. There was no plea of this kind put forward, nor any evidence led. The evidence of Kanhaiya Lal, if believed, negatives it altogether. In any case I am not prepared to assume that the accused was not aware that the drug which was mixed in one of the peras at least was anything but dhatura, which the doctors found to have been the drug. Dhatura is a very common drug, and it is well known that it is poisonous. A person of the age of the accused must be presumed to know that such a drug is poisonous. If he causes such a drug to be administered, he must be presumed at least to know that it is likely that he will thereby cause hurt. The word "hurt" is defined in section 319 of the Indian Penal Code as meaning either bodily pain or disease or infirmity to any person. The bodily pain or infirmity obviously may either be permanent or temporary. If a person by the administration of that drug is thrown into a delirium, with the possible risk of falling into coma and becoming unconscious for the time being, it is clear that both bodily pain and infirmity are caused. "Infirmity" has been defined by one author as inability of an organ to perform its normal function which may either be temporary or permanent. In my opinion this definition seems to be correct. Under the circumstances there can be no doubt that the accused must be deemed to have had knowledge that the administering of the drug was likely to cause hurt within the meaning of section 319 of the Indian Penal Code.

It is very fortunate that none of the persons, who took the peras, died. The boy Shanti however was in a very serious condition of collapse, and at one time it was seriously feared that his heart was failing. Luckily he escaped death. Musammat Chando also was comparatively very seriously ill. Under the circumstances although the accused cannot be said to have actually intended to cause any hurt to either of these persons, yet as his act was a grossly rash one. I think that the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment does not err on the side of severity. The result is that this appeal fails and it is dismissed. The appellant who is on bail must surrender at once.

Appeal dismissed.

S. A. No. 946 of 1923, decided on the 22nd June, 1923, against the decree of the District Judge of Gorakhpur, dated 23rd February, 1923.

Evidence Act, S. 71—Attesting witnesses won over by the other side—Evidence of writer sufficient.

Where it was found by the Courts below that the attesting witnesses had been won over and gave evidence hostile to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff examined the writer of the deed to prove execution under S. 71 and his evidence was accepted. Held: that the contention that it is necessary that this witness should have been able to swear that both the attesting witnesses were present when the executant signed the deed and that they witnessed it is untenable. (17 A.L.J. 141 and 1922 Pat. 415, Foll.)

The law provides that the attesting witnesses, if available, must be called and that in their absence no other evidence to prove execution shall be accepted: If they are dead or have been won over by the other side the person claiming under the document is allowed to prove it as best he can. It is sufficient if he can prove execution by any evidence that may be available.

P. L. Banerjee—for the Appellant.

Judgment:—The only plea urged in this appeal is that the mortgage sued on was not proved. It has been found by the courts below that the attesting witnesses had been won over and gave evidence hostile to the plaintiff. The plaintiff examined the writer of the deed to prove execution under section 71 of the Evidence Act and his evidence has been accepted. The appellant's contention is that it is necessary that this witness should have been able to swear that both the attesting witnesses were present when the executant signed the deed and that they witnessed it. This point is concluded against him by the authority both of this High Court and of the Patna High Court. In Narain Das v. Dilawar (1) it was held by a Bench consisting of Richards, C.J., and Banerji, J., that if the mortgage appeared on the face of it to have been executed in the presence of more than one person and it was proved in the manner prescribed by section 71 of the Evidence Act, this was sufficient. In Laksman Sahu v. Gokhul Maharana (2) the question was still more specifically dealt with. The relevant passage in the judgment of Das, J., who delivered the leading judgment is as follows:—"The learned Vakil who has argued this case on behalf of the respondent urges before us that the proof of execution will not help the plaintiff; it must be proved that the document was properly attested. In my opinion so far as section 71 of the Evidence Act is concerned, execution includes attestation, for section 71 only operates if the attesting witness denies or does not recollect the execution of the document."

We think that these rulings correctly express the intention of section 71. The main object of attestation is to secure unimpeachable evidence of the execution of the document. The law provides that the attesting witnesses, if available, must be called and that in their absence no other evidence to prove execution shall be accepted. If they are dead or have been won over by the other side the person claiming under the document is allowed to prove it as best he can. It is sufficient if he can prove execution by any evidence that may be available. It would be laying an impossible burden on him to require that he should be able to produce a witness who could not only prove execution but was also able to swear that both the attesting witnesses were present and that they attested the deed. We accordingly dismiss the appeal under Order 41, rule 11.

M. Muhammad Jan—Plaintiff-Appellant.

Shiam Lal and others—Defendants-Respondents.

Ex. S. A. Nos. 1430 and 1431 of 1922, decided on the 14th December, 1923, from the decree of the District Judge, Budaun, dated 31st July, 1922.

(a) Civ. Pro. Code, O. 20, r. 14—Deposit made on re-opening day the Court being closed on the day of deposit, is valid—Limitation Act, S. 4.

By an appellate decree, the plaintiff in two pre-emption cases was given one month from the 27th of September, 1921, within which to deposit certain money, if he desired to obtain the benefit of the decree in his favour. The Civil Courts closed for the vacation in that year on the 30th of September and re-opened on the 4th November. On that date the successful plaintiff made the deposit required by the decree.

Held: that the deposit tendered by Muhammad Jan the plaintiff on the 4th November, 1921, was in time under the terms of the decree. Although the parties themselves cannot extend the time for doing an act in Court, yet if the delay is caused, not by any act of their own, but by some act of the Court itself, such as the fact of the Court being closed, they are entitled to do the act on the first opening day. Piggot, J.:—The facts out of which the two appeals before us arise are stated in the referring order of the 22nd June, 1923. In substance they amount to this: By an appellate decree, the plaintiff in two pre-emption cases was given one month from the 27th of September, 1921, within which to deposit certain money, if he desired to obtain the benefit of the decrees in his favour. The civil courts closed for the vacation in that year on the 30th of September and reopened on the 4th of November. On that date the successful plaintiff made the deposit required by the decree. The courts below have held that it was too late, more than thirty days having elapsed since the 27th of September, 1921. There was authority of this court for the view thus adopted. This is to be found in the case of Hirday Narain v. Alam Singh (1). The attention of the courts below was not drawn to the fact that, since the decision above referred to a Bench of this Court, in the case of Reoti Ram Sita Ram (2) had arrived at a different conclusion. The matter has been referred to a Full Bench in order that these conflicting decisions may be reconsidered. The position is so far an unfortunate one that in Reoti Ram's case the attention of the Bench was not called to the decision in Hirday Narain's case, while on the other hand the decision in Reoti Ram's case is founded upon an older decision of this Court which was not laid before the Bench which decided Hirday Narain's case. The older decision in question is the case of Dabi Din Rai v. Muhammad Ali (3). We now find moreover that another Bench of this Court, in the case of Bisheshar Naik v. Said-ud-din (4), had held a deposit made under circumstances precisely similar to those which we are now considering to have been made in time. The question for determination is whether the deposit made by the plaintiff Muhammad Jan was or was not within time under the terms of the decree. We have no desire to discuss any question as to the powers of the Court to extend that time; nor do we hold that the case falls within the provisions of section 10 of the General Clauses Act. As regards the decisions of this Court there is clearly a preponderance of authority in favour of the plaintiff appellant. The current of authority is broken only by the decision in Hirday Narain's case. The facts in that case were to this extent peculiar, that the deposit made by the plaintiff was not made actually on the first possible day after the reopening of the courts, but one day later. It is true that a point was made in argument of the fact that, on the first available day, the treasury where the deposit was required to be made was only open for one hour; but we do not know how far this circumstance may have affected the decision of the Hon'ble Judges. There are two cases of other High Courts which are in our opinion in point. In the case of Shooshi Bhushan Rudro v. Gobind Chander Roy (5) the Calcutta High Court, relying upon certain Engligh cases, made the following observations:—

> "The broad principle there laid down "is that, although the parties themselves "cannot extend the time for doing an act "in court, yet if the delay is caused, not by "any act of their own, but by some act of "the Court itself, such as the fact of the "court being closed, they are entitled "to do the act on the first opening day".

They go on to remark that this principle had been affirmed in older cases of the same court.

The same principle was laid down by another Bench of the same Court in the case of Peary Mohan v. Ananda Charan (6) in which again two older cases are referred to. We desire to refer also to the case of Sambasiva Chari v. Ramasami Reddi (7). The significance of that case lies in the fact that the Hon'ble Judges repelled contentions based upon the statutory provisions of the Indian Limitation Act and of the General Clauses Act; but nevertheless held that there is a generally recognized principle of law under which parties who are prevented from doing a thing in court on a particular day, not by any act of their own, but by the court itself, are entitled to do it at the first subsequent opportunity. It is quite true that this case, as well as Shooshi Bhushans Rudro's case, was laid before the Bench of this court which decided Hirday Narain's case. The learned Judges there remarked that these cases have nothing to do with the question then being argued before the court. Strictly speaking this remark is correct, as the Hon'ble Judges were then dealing with a pre-emption decree prescribing a certain period for the doing of a certain act; but it does seem to us that the general principle affirmed in the Calcutta and Madras cases is applicable and is sound in law. In view of these considerations and, taking account of the fact that the general current of authority in this Court has been opposed to the decision in Hirday Narain's case, we think that that case should now be overruled and the law affirmed as settled by two previous decisions and one subsequent one. In our opinion the deposit tendered by Muhammad Jan the plaintiff on the 4th of November, 1921, was in time under the terms of the decree and should have been accepted. We therefore allow these appeals, set aside the order of the court below and dismiss the application of the defendants to have the decree of the 27th of September, 1921, executed as a decree in their favour. The appellant will have his costs throughout. It will be for the plaintiff Muhammad Jan to make such further application to the trial court as he may be advised, if he desires to obtain execution of thedecree in his favour.

Appeal allowed.

Sardara and others—Appellants.

v.

King-Emperor—Respondent.

Cr. App. No. 665 of 1923, decided on the 14th December, 1923, against the decision of the Sessions Judge, Moradabad, dated 13th July, 1923.

(a) Criminal trial—Conviction—Severity of sentence should be lessened because of service to crown.

Where the accused has rendered service to crown, in giving evidence against some members of his gang which evidence resulted in their conviction, his conviction was altered from one of death to that of transportation for life. [P. 223, C. 1.]

(b) Criminal Pro. Code, S. 337—Statements previous to tender of pardon are admissible against the approver.

A previous admission made by accused, who was subsequently tendered pardon, is admissible in evidence against him. (11 All. 79, Dist.)

M. L. Sandal—for the Appellant.

The Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Piggot, J.:—In this case Sardara, Bansi and Pokha, described as pasias by caste, residents of the same village, mauza Meoli, in the Rampur State, were put on their trial on a charge framed under section 396, I.P.C., in respect of a dacoity committed on the 27th June, 1922, at a village called Majhaula, in the Bahjoi police circle of the Moradabad District. The learned Sessions Judge has convicted all three accused and the record is before us for confirmation of sentence of death passed by the sessions court. The accused have submitted petitions of appeal and the case has been argued by Counsel on their behalf. The commission of a serious dacoity on the date and at the place specified in the charge is proved by abundant evidence and is not contested. The villagers seem to have expected succour from a fort belonging to a local Raja and as the dacoits, who were somewhere about thirty in number, were leaving the house which they had plundered, they found it necessary to fire on the assembled villagers in order to clear a passage for themselves. The evidence is that either two or three shots were fired, that two villagers were killed on the spot and others wounded. It will be convenient to consider at once the circumstances under which the three appellants came to be implicated. More than a month later, that is to say, on the 30th July, 1922, the police in the Etah District arrested under circumstances of grave suspicion, certain persons who were endeavouring to travel by train from the railway station of Kasganj or other railway stations on the same line in that district. Amongst the persons so arrested were these three accused, Sardara, Bansi and Pokha. The learned Sessions Judge does not say that they were arrested together; but he says that they were arrested under circumstances warranting the inference that they had gone to the Etah District on one and the same business. Sardara was produced before a Magistrate on the 1st of August, 1922, the next day but one after his arrest. To that Magistrate he made a detailed confession, admitting his complicity in dacoities which had just been committed in the Etah District and also referring to other dacoities committed by the same gang in other districts. Amongst the dacoities referred to in this confession is this offence committed at Majhaula for which the three accused have now been tried and convicted. In consequence of this statement the three accused were placed, along with a number of other under-trial prisoners, in the Etah Jail on the 17th of August, 1922, when witnesses from Majhaula were brought to see if they could identify any of them. Evidence as to this identification proceeding has been given by the Magistrate under whose supervision it was conducted. The result, so far as we are concerned, was that one witness, by name Angan Lal, picked out the accused Sardara and Bansi from amongst the entire number of persons paraded before him for identification. He has been consistent throughout in his statement in respect of these two men. He says they were amongst the decoits who committed the offence at Majhaula and that Sardara had a gun. It was a dark night, but the dacoits had lit torches inside the house and, when they were leaving the house, the witness deposes that they passed quite close to him. This witness made no mistake in his identification; that is to say, he did not profess to recognize any of the persons placed before him except Sardara and Bansi. One other witness, by name B ba Ram, picked out the accused Bansi and Pokha as persons whom he recognized as having been amongst the dacoits at Majhaula; but he also picked out and made the same assertion concerning an under-trial prisoner who admittedly had nothing whatever to do with the dacoity at Majhaula. His evidence is therefore discounted to this extent, that he has shown himself capable of making a wrong identification. We need not refer for the moment to the proceedings taken in the Etah and Aligarh districts in respect of the dacoities committed there. The record of the present trial shows that when these three accused persons were placed on their trial at Moradabad they simply pleaded not guilty. There is nothing in the statement of Sardara to the effect that he had been tendered a pardon in the Etah District. He did not make a statement to this effect before the Committing Magistrate at Moradabad, nor did he enter any such plea in the sessions court. In his petition of appeal to this Court what he says is that, having been tendered a pardon, he gave evidence as a prosecution witness in connection with one dacoity committed in the Etah District and one dacoity committed in the Aligarh District. He adds that, as a matter of fact, he knew nothing whatever, about any dacoity committed in the Moradabad District, but that after his arrest the police had suggested to him that he should include this Moradabad dacoity in his statement and he had fallen in with the suggestion.

It was after examining this petition of appeal that the question was raised before the Bench hearing the said appeal as to whether Sardara ought to have been tried at all by the Sessions Judge of Moradabad. It is quite true that he did not plead in that sessions court any pardon in bar of his trial; but in the case of a prisoner of this class, not represented by Counsel, it would not be fair to press such a point against him. This Court has therefore undertaken to investigate the question whether there was or was not in existence a Magistrate's order, having the effect of a valid tender of pardon in respect of this offence at Majhaula of which Sardara has now been convicted, which pardon the said Sardara could have pleaded in bar of his trial. In the record of the Etah dacoity, Sessions Trial No. 57 of 1922, we do not find any formal order drawn up by the Committing Magistrate, or by any other Magistrate, of the kind presupposed by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. We do find however something which may be treated as, for practical purposes, the equivalent of such a proceeding. It appears that on the 6th September, 1922, Sardara was produced before Mr. Abdul Haq, a Magistrate of the first class. The Magistrate began his examination of Sardara by recording the following question :—

"Are you prepared to accept a pardon upon this condition, that you shall state accurately and fully all the facts known to you concerning (or connected with) the Nagla Kunji dacoity?"

The accused replied, "yes, I am so prepared".

Upon this a statement was recorded bearing on this dacoity at Nagla Kunji. There is nothing in that statement which refers to the offence for participation in in which Sardara has now been convicted. Accepting this record as proving the tender of a pardon to Sardara under the conditions prescribed by section 337 of the Code of Criminal Procedure we are satisfied that this tender was only in respect of the offence then under investigation by Mr. Abdul Haq, Magistrate of the first class. That was the offence of dacoity committed at Nagla Kunji in Etah District. The pardon as tendered has clearly no reference to the dacoity committed more than a month previously at this village of Majhaula in the Moradabad District. Reference might of course be made to section 339 (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure; but we are bound to note that the statement which has been tendered in evidence against Sardara at this trial is not the statement which he made to Mr. Abdul Haq on the 6th of September, 1922, nor any other statement made by him subsequently to the tender of pardon. What is being put in evidence is his original confession before another Magistrate made on the 1st of August, 1922. We are satisfied that there is nothing in section 339 of the Criminal Procedure Code which forbids this confession of the 1st of August, 1922, from being put in evidence. We have been referred to, and have carefully considered, the ruling of a learned Judge of this Court in the case of Queen-Empress v. Ganga Charan (1). That case is certainly distinguishable. In the first place, the statement which was being put in evidence against the accused Ganga Charan in the reported case was the very statement which he had made after a pardon had been tendered to him and on the strength of that tender of pardon. In the second place, the learned Judge of this Court, having gone into all the circumstances under which pardon had been tendered to and accepted by Ganga Charan, satisfied himself that the offences for which Ganga Charan was afterwards being put upon his trial in another district (and indeed in another province) were so connected with the offences in respect of which he had accepted the tender of pardon, and had given evidence as a witness at the first trial, that they were covered by the terms of the pardon which had been tendered to Ganga Charan. For the reasons already indicated we are unable to say the same of the offence committed at Majhaula with which we are concerned in the present case. We hold therefore that, apart altogether from the fact that no pardon was pleaded in bar of trial in the present case, there was as a matter of fact in existence no pardon which could legally have been pleaded by Sardara in bar of his trial in respect of the offence for which he was tried and convicted by the Sessions Judge of Moradabad.

We now come to the evidence in the case. Sardara has been convicted on the confession made by him on the 1st of August, 1922, taken with the evidence of Angan Lal. In our opinion he was rightly convicted upon this evidence. There is no reason whatever to distrust the bona fides of Angan Lal's evidence, and he showed himself capable of identifying two men accurately out of the dacoits whom he had seen at Majhaula. Moreover, Sardara's confession, made on the 1st of August, 1922, has been proved in the present case by the Magistrate who recorded it, and we have the Magistrate's testimony to the fact that it was made voluntarily. It seems altogether a farfetched suggestion that the police of the Etah District, the moment these men arrested under suspicious circumstances had fallen into their hands, should have thought of coaching one of them to make a full confession in respect of a dacoity committed more than a month previously in another district. There is no room for the suggestion that this confession of the 1st of August, 1922, was prompted by any promise of pardon. The Magistrate who recorded it took pains to satisfy himself on this point; moreover, the promise of pardon was made more than a month later in consequence of this confession, and not this confession in consequence of any promise of pardon. We are satisfied that Sardara has been rightly convicted.

As regards Bansi we come to the same conclusion. There are two identification witnesses against him and the cumulative effect of such evidence is always important. He is also implicated in the retracted confession of Sardara.

We are less satisfied with regard to Pokha. The only identification evidence against him is that of the witness Biba Ram, who proved himself capable of making a bona fide mistake in identity. He is only implicated in Sardara's confession in vague and general terms. The circumstances of his arrest, on which considerable stress is laid by the learned Sessions Judge, would no doubt serve to supply a considerable degree of corroboration of Sardara's assertion that this man Pokha, along with Bansi, was concerned in the dacoity committed at Nagla Kunji in the Etah District immediately prior to their arrest; but it does not supply any real corroboration of Sardara's statement that Pokha, along with Bansi and others, had been concerned in the Majhaula dacoity more than a month previously. In our opinion the evidence against Pokha falls short of satisfactory or conclusive proof. We accept his appeal, set aside the conviction and sentence against him and direct that, so far as this matter is concerned, he be set at liberty. We have finally to consider the question of sentence as against Sardara and Bansi. The learned Sessions Judge, in entire ignorance of the facts we have ascertained as to the previous dacoity cases in the Etah and Aligarh districts, was no doubt justified in passing sentence of death upon Sardara in the present case. The dacoity was a serious one, the murder of two villagers was a cruel and wanton act and the act itself was brought very close to Sardara by evidence that he was himself carrying a gun at the time. We think however that the public service done by Sardara in giving evidence for the Crown in two cases in the Etah and Aligarh districts, which we know to have resulted in the conviction of other members of the gang, deserves recognition at least to this extent, that he may be permitted to save his own neck from the rope. If we set aside the sentence of death against Sardara we feel that we must do the same in the case of Bansi. Accordingly, we accept the appeals of Sardara and Bansi to this extent only, that, while affirming the conviction recorded in respect of each of them, we set aside the sentence of death and, in lieu thereof, direct Sardara and Bansi to undergo transportation for life.

Convictions altered.

Mukarram Ali Khan—Defendant-Appellant.

v.

Anjuman-un-nissa Bibi and Asghar Ali Khan—Plaintiff-Defendant-Respondents.

S. A. No. 1592 of 1920, decided on the 24th October, 1922, from the decree of the District Judge, Budaun, dated 26th July, 1920.

Mahomedan Law—Waqf—Provision for maintenance of relatives and dependents does not invalidate.

A dedication for the purposes of charity, including maintenance of relatives and dependents, and for the reading of the fateha for the salvation of the soul of dedicator constitutes a valid waqf. [P. 224, C. 1.]

S. M. Sulaiman and S. N. Sen—for the Appellant.

Iqbal Ahmad—for the Respondents.

Judgment:—The only point which requires decision in the present appeal is whether the property in dispute is waqf property or not. The plaintiff respondent, Musammat Anjuman-un-nissa, purchased the property in suit from Asghar Ali Khan, defendant, respondent No. 2, on the 14th of November, 1917. Soon after her purchase she made an application to the Revenue Court for mutation of names in her favour. The defendant-appellant, Mukarram Ali Khan, who is a cousin of Asghar Ali Khan, objected to the mutation of names in favour of the vendee on the ground that the property in respect of which mutation of names was sought was waqf property, and hence the vendor of the plaintiff-respondent No. 1 had no right to convey it.

Both parties gave evidence and the claim of the plaintiff was decreed. The decree of the first court was upheld in appeal. Mukarram Ali Khan has come up in second appeal before us and contends that the property in suit was dedicated prior to 1854 to certain charitable purposes and that the decisions of the court below as to the validity of the waqf are erroneous. It appears from the materials on the record that there has been litigation in respect of this property prior to the present dispute. The former litigations were in 1901-1902 and 1915-1917. In the former litigation of 1901, which arose out of partition proceedings, the decision of the District Court was adverse to the contention of the defendant-appellant. On the other hand, in the litigation of 1915-1917, which ended in this Court, the decision was in favour of the contention of the defendant-appellant. Both parties to the present appeal call to their aid the decisions of 1902 and 1917, contending that the matter is res judicata. We think that the question of res judicata does not really arise in the present case as some of the parties to the former litigations were different. The real point, as we have already remarked, for consideration is whether the property in question is waqf. We find from the papers on the record that one Mardan Ali Khan was the owner of the property in suit and some other considerable landed property. According to the statement of the defendant-appellant, he (Mardan Ali Khan) dedicated the property in suit to certain charitable and religious objects. After his death there was a dispute between his descendants and the matter was referred to arbitration. The award given by the arbitrators found the property now in suit as waqf property dedicated by Mardan Ali Khan for the purposes of charity, including maintenance of his relatives and his dependents, and for the reading of the fateha for the salvation of his soul. Now we have to consider whether the above-mentioned objects would constitute objects of a valid waqf. The contention on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent No. 1, the vendee, is that the dedication was really for the benefit of Mardan Ali Khan's descendants and for keeping the property in his family, and that the mention of the dependents, the charitable purposes and the fateha was merely a pretence to evade the law under which a dedication for the maintenance of the members of a family was, at that time, invalid. We have given due consideration to the argument of the learned Counsel for the plaintiff respondent No. 1, but we find ourselves unable to agree with him. We think that the real object of Mardan Ali Khan was to dedicate a portion of his property for the reading of the fateha and for umur-i-khair (charitable purposes) including the maintenance of his poor relatives and dependents. Such a dedication is, it is not denied, valid under the Muhammadan law. The opinion of the learned Judge of the lower appellate court that the objects of the waqf were uncertain and illusory, is not sound and is not supported by any valid reasons. We, therefore, hold that the waqf in question was a valid waqf. We allow the appeal and set aside the decrees of the courts below and dismiss the suit of the plaintiff respondent No. 1 with costs in all courts.

Appeal allowed.

Cr. Ref. No. 371 of 1923, decided on 11th August, 1923, from the decision of the Addl. District Judge, Allahabad, dated 23rd June, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 250—Appellate Court cannot act under this section.

It is only the trying Magistrate who, if he discharges accused persons, can order compensation to be paid. The appellate Court has no jurisdiction to proceed under S. 250. (28 All. 625 and 39 Cal. 157, F.B., Foll)

S. Sinha—for the Applicant.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a reference by the Additional Sessions Judge at Mirzapur. It appears that there were two trials before a Magistrate of the third class. Ram Lal was convicted under section 447 of the Indian Penal Code in one and three other accused persons were convicted under section 352 of the Indian Penal Code in the other. Both these accused persons preferred an appeal to the District Magistrate, who allowed their appeals, set aside the convictions and released the accused. In addition to this he called upon the complainant to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay compensation under section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Eventually he ordered the complainant to pay Rs. 20 as compensation to Ram Lal and Rs. 10 each to the other three accused.

The learned Additional Sessions Judge has referred these cases to this Court with a recommendation that the order awarding compensation should be set aside as being without jurisdiction.

In my opinion this reference must be accepted. The wording of the section is very clear. It is only the trying Magistrate who, if he discharges accused persons, can order compensation to be paid. The appellate court has no jurisdiction to proceed under section 250. This was the view taken by Stanley, C.J., in the case of Balli Pande v. Chittan (1). That case has been followed by the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Mehi Singh v. Mangal Khandu (2). In my opinion therefore the order passed by the District Magistrate directing compensation to be paid was ultra vires. I accept this reference and set aside that part of the District Magistrate's order which directed that the complainant should pay compensation to the various persons. The compensation if paid will be refunded.

Reference accepted.

Civ. Rev. No. 153 of 1922, dated 12th April, 1923, from the Addl. Sub-Judge, Aligarh, dated 25th September, 1922.

(a) Civ. Pro. Code, S. 151—Decree set aside for want of guardian—Procedure.

Where the previous suit had failed for want of a lawful guardian, the proceedings in it including the decision are a nullity from the point when the improper appointment of the guardian was made. It is not a commencement of a fresh suit. It is not an application for rehearing, because in the eye of law there has been none. It is not an application to restore. It is an application to revive it by the appointment of a proper guardian so that from the date of such appointment it becomes a properly constituted suit in which the differences between the parties can be decided.

(b) Civ. Pro. Code, O. 32, r. 3—Improper appointment of guardian ad litem*—Effect.*

The improper appointment of a guardian has the effect of invalidating the proceedings in the suit including the decision, from the point the improper appointment was made. (39 All. 8, Foll.).

Durga Prasad—for the Applicant.

Ibn-i-Ahmad—for the Opposite parties.

Judgment:—We think the Judge has taken an altogether erroneous view in the matter. It is not perhaps surprising as it is a very technical point, and it is extremely difficult to see one's way clear through the proper procedure but the matter is made absolutely clear by the luminous judgment of late Sir Sunder Lal in Bhagwan Dayal v. Param Sukh Das (1) and if the Judge had had this decision brought to his notice and explained, he no doubt would have taken the view that we now take. We agree with the decision in that case. The ratio decidendi is that the previous suit having failed for want of a lawful guardian the proceedings in it including the decision are a nullity from the point when the improper appointment of the guardian was made. It is not therefore a commencement of fresh suit. It is not an application for rehearing because in the eyes of law there has been none. It is not an application to restore. It is an application to revive it by the appointment of a proper guardian so that from the date of such appointment it becomes a properly constituted suit in which the difference between the parties can be decided. We return the record to the Court below, making the order which the lower Court ought to have made, namely, that the suit be revived as from the point at which the application for appointment of guardian is to be made. No appointment is now necessary in the case of Babu Lal who has become sui juris, but the other minor still requires a lawful guardian, and the plaintiff must apply to the trial Court in due course for the appointment of a lawful guardian. It is understood that this order of revival is only as against the persons who were formerly sued as minors. There is a suggestion in the judgment under revision that some decision on the merits was come to in the original suit. Whether that is so or not it must be clearly understood that, as against these two persons who were then sued as minors, there is no previous decision on the merits. If there was a previous decision it must be disregarded by the lower Court. The whole case is to be tried de novo starting its new life from the date of the application for the appointment of a guardian. The application is allowed with costs.

Application allowed.

Teja—Defendant-Appellant

v.

Tika Ram—Plaintiff-Respondent.

F. A. F. O. No. 180 of 1923, decided on 4th July, 1923, from the order of the Addl. Sessions Judge, Aligarh, dated 2nd November, 1922.

Decree — Setting aside—Decree wrong but not challenged by the party concerned—Cannot be challenged for him by any one else.

Nanhe and Teja were brothers who together formed a joint family. They owned an ancestral house. On the 4th February, 1908, Nanhe mortgaged the whole house to Tika Ram. Tika Ram sued on his mortgage and got a preliminary decree for sale in 1912. Before Tika Ram could get an order for sale under O. 34, r. 5, Teja the other brother brought a suit to avoid the mortgage on the ground that Nanhe as a member of an undivided joint Hindu family could not make a valid mortgage of the ancestral house without his consent and in the absence of legal necessity and for a declaration that the house could not be sold under the mortgage decree. The suit was decreed on January 4th, 1918. Thereupon Tika Ram abandoned his rights under the mortgage and asked the Court then seized of the execution proceedings to pass a decree under O. 34, r. 6 and that was done. The effect of that was to give Tika Ram a simple money decree against Nanhe. Nanhe was a party to these proceedings, but he did not contest the application nor did he appeal from the order passed. In execution of that decree the right, title and interest of Nanhe in the house in suit was put up for sale and was purchased by Tika Ram who then brought a suit for partition for half the house on the allegation that Nanhe's right, title and interest in the whole house amounted to half. Teja having failed to set aside the sale in the execution department filed a counter suit for declaration that the execution sale in favour of Tika was invalid and that he (Tika Ram) was not entitled to partition the house, Held, that the Court passed an order which it should not have passed having regard to the provisions of the Code. But it was seized of the execution of the case and it did pass that decree. Whether right or wrong that decree not having been challenged by Nanhe, the party concerned and any one who stands in his shoes as Tika Ram does in this case, cannot go behind it. Tika Ram although in the inception his title was impeachable, has now acquired an absolute title which is good against all the world and therefore good against Teja. Ryves, J.:—The facts, as now found, under which this appeal arises are as follows :—

Nanhe and Teja were brothers who together formed a joint Hindu family. They owned an ancestral house. On the 4th February, 1908, Nanhe mortgaged the whole house to Tika Ram. Tika Ram sued on his mortgage and got a preliminary decree for sale in 1912. Before Tika Ram could get an order for sale under Order 34, rule 5, Teja, the other brother, brought a suit to avoid the mortgage on the ground that Nanhe, as a member of an undivided joint Hindu family, could not make a valid mortgage of the ancestral house without his consent and in the absence of legal necessity, and for a declaration that the house could not be sold under the mortgage decree. That suit was decreed on January 4th, 1913. Thereupon Tika Ram abandoned his rights under the mortgage, and asked the Court, then seized of the execution proceedings, to pass a decree under Order 34, rule 6, and that was done. The effect of that was to give Tika Ram a simple money decree against Nanhe. It is to be noted here, that Nanhe was a party to these proceedings. He did not contest the application, nor did he appeal from the order passed. It is also to be noted that Tika Ram's suit was brought within 6 years of the mortgage, and that he was entitled, at the date of his suit to get a simple money decree, if the mortgage, on the basis of which he sued, was found to be for any reason invalid. In execution of that decree the right, title and interest of Nanhe in the house in suit was put up for sale and was purchased by Tika Ram, who then brought a suit for partition of half the house on the allegation that Nanhe's right, title and interest in the whole house amounted to half. Teja having failed to set aside the sale in the execution department, filed a counter suit for a declaration that the auction-sale in favour of Tika Ram was invalid and that he (Tika Ram) was not entitled to partition the house. Both suits were tried together. The trial Court decreed Teja's suit and dismissed Tika Ram's. Tika Ram appealed. The lower appellate Court dismissed Teja's suit and remanded Tika Ram's suit to the first Court to carry out the partition. Teja appeals from that order of remand in this case, and in the connected second appeal which is also before us.

The main contention is that the decree passed under Order 34, rule 6 was a nullity as being beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, and that it therefore conveyed no title to Tika Ram, on the ground that there having been no confirmation of the preliminary decree and no sale under Order 34, rule 5, the Court had no jurisdiction to grant a decree under Order 34, rule 6; and reliance was placed on a recent decision of this Court in the case of Darbari Mal v. Moola Singh (1). It seems to us that that case has no application here, because in that case it was the judgment-debtor who objected to the passing of the decree under Order 34, rule 6. In this case no doubt Nanhe might, if he had been so advised, have raised an objection to the Court passing this decree, or he might have appealed from that decree. But it seems to us that inasmuch as he (Nanhe) has accepted that decree Teja cannot challenge it. We will assume that it is correct to say that a decree under Order 34, rule 6 should only be passed when there has been a sale over, and that the decree in this case under Order 34, rule 6 was erroneous. It seems to us, however, that the well-known Privy Council case of Malkarjun v. Narhari (2), applies to this case. Here, (as there), the Court passed an order which, it may be conceded, it should not have passed having regard to the provisions of the Code. But it was seized of the execution of the case and it did pass that decree. Whether right or wrong that decree, not having been challenged by Nanhe, the party concerned, it seems to us that he, and any one who stands in his shoes, as we think Tika Ram does in this case cannot go behind it. So far as the appellant is concerned, he challenges the title of Tika Ram to ask for partition or to stand in any way, so far as he, Teja, is concerned, in the capacity towards him of a co-sharer. But the result of the views expressed in the foregoing observations is that Tika Ram, although in the inception his title was impeachable, has now acquired an absolute title which is good against all the world, and therefore good against Teja.

(1) (1920) 42 All. 519=18 A.L.J. 628=56 I.C. 139,

Teja, in equity, has really no case. If Teja had asked to be joined as a defendant in Tika Ram's suit in 1912, as he could have done, and raised the same defence that he subsequently raised, Tika Ram might have abandoned the mortgage and asked for a simple money decree against Nanhe as he was entitled to do, (the suit having been brought within 6 years of the bond), and if so, he probably would have got as he was entitled to get a simple money decree against Nanhe. In execution of that decree he could undoubtedly have attached and sold Nanhe's share in the house, and if he purchased it, he would have been entitled to partition the house. We cannot see under the actual circumstances of this case that Teja's interests are damnified. On a partition Teja is only entitled to half the house. Nanhe could have partitioned it, and Nanhe's representatives can do so also. No injustice is done to Teja. The half share of Teja in the house is not imperilled. But Teja cannot be allowed "to pull the chesnuts out of the fire" for Nanhe's benefit.

No doubt it is very inconvenient for Teja, that the ancestral house should be partitioned, but to avoid this he had only to pay up the debt due by Nanhe, his brother. The learned Counsel for the respondent says that his client will not press his right to partition the house, if his debt is paid up in full to date. This seems to us to be most natural and satisfactory solution of a litigation, which does not impress us as being particularly honest on Teja's part.

The other points raised, though pressed by Mr. Haribans Sahai with his usual ability and pertinacity, are in our opinion untenable.

We dismiss the appeal with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale, if the certificate has been filed.

This judgment covers the connected second appeal, which we dismiss with costs.

Dhanraj Misir—Plaintiff-Appellant

v.

Rameshwar Misir—Defendant-Respondent.

S. A. No. 488 of 1922, decided on the 22nd November, 1923, from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Basti, dated 7th January, 1922.

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Construction—Preference among co sharers inter se.

Two Wajib-ul-arzes were produced by the plaintiff in support of the custom of pre-emption. The first one of 1860 provided that every co-sharer has a right to transfer his share but at the time of transferring it, it is incumbent on him to inform the near co-sharer (hissedar qaribi) and in case of his refusal the other co-sharers of the village, and in case of both these sets of co-sharers refuse, then he is entitled to sell it to whomsoever he likes.

The other wajib-ul-arz of 1886 provided that when a co-sharer wishes to sell his share the right of a co-sharer who is a near relation, then of a co-sharer who is a distant relation, then all co-sharers in the patti and then co-sharers in the nambardari and then the other co-sharers of the village shall have a priority and preference. In the case of refusal by them the co-sharer has a right to sell it to any one he likes.

Held: that having regard to the language of both the wajib-ul-arzes there was a right of preference inter se. (7 A.L.J. 610, Dist.) [P. 228, C. 1.]

G. Agarwala—for Appellant.

N. Upadhiya—for Respondent.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The first Court decreed the claim but on appeal the suit has been dismissed.

Both the Courts below agree that there is a custom of pre-emption in this village. The Court of first instance was further of opinion that under that custom a nearer co-sharer was entitled to a preferential right as against a distant co-sharer. The lower appellate Court has come to a contrary conclusion.

Two wajib-ul-arzes were produced by the plaintiff in support of the alleged custom.

The first one was of 1860 which provided that every co-sharer has a right to transfer his share but at the time of transferring it, it is incumbent on him to inform the near co-sharer (hissedar qaribi) and in case of his refusal the other co-sharers of the village, and in case both these sets of co-sharers refuse, then he is entitled to sell it to whomsoever he likes.

Reading this clause there can be no doubt whatsoever that under the custom it was the right of the near co-sharer to have the first offer. If without any such offer having been made to the near co-sharer in the first instance property was sold to a distant co-sharer the near co-sharer could obviously urge that the custom had not been complied with. The wording of this wajib-ul-arz makes it clear that there was a preference inter se between the co-sharers.

The other wajib-ul-arz was of the year 1886 which provided that when a co-sharer wishes to sell his share the right of a co-sharer who is a near relation, then of a co-sharer who is a distant relation, then all co-sharers in the patti and then co-sharers in the nambardari and then the other co-sharers of the village shall have a priority and preference. In the case of refusal by them the co-sharer has a right to sell it to any one he likes. This wajib-ul-arz also in our opinion gives a preference inter se. When it is read in connection with the previous one, no doubt is left in our minds.

The learned Judge of the Court below has in his judgment remarked that the case reported in Mathura Singh v. Ramlal Singh (1) marks a departure from the rules of law laid down in the previous cases and particularly in the case of Gurdial v. Mathura Singh (2). That is not correct. The wajib-ul-arz in the case reported in 7 A.L.J. 610 clearly provided that in the case of a sale or mortgage the transferor was bound to transfer first to a co-sharer in the patti and then to pattidars of the mahal, then to owners of other mahals, and in case of their refusal to outsiders. It was then held that if the transferor had not transferred the property to a co-sharer in the patti the latter had a right of pre-emption. This was obviously correct. Whereas in the other case the wajib-ul-arz was to the effect that in case of a transfer of property the right to claim pre-emption would be as follows :—

First to warisan ek jaddi qaribi ; then to hissedar of the patti, and then to co-sharers in the village.

It was held that that evidence was insufficient to prove the plaintiff's case that in case of a transfer to a co-sharer there was a preferential right in a nearer co-sharer. It is noteworthy that the wording of that wajib-ul-arz referred to a case where a transfer had taken place, and provided for a right to claim pre-emption.

In the present case we have no doubt in our minds that, having regard to the language of both the wajib-ul-arzes, there was a right of preference inter se.

The learned vakil for the respondent has urged that in that view of the matter the case ought to go back for a finding as to whether the plaintiff is in fact the near relation of the vendor. The Court of first instance distinctly found that the plaintiff and the defendant vendor were near relations ; and that the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses was to that effect. When the defendant went up in appeal before the District Judge the point was not clearly taken that the finding was wrong. There is really no satisfactory evidence on behalf of the defendant to rebut the evidence of the plaintiff.

We therefore accept the finding of the first Court that the plaintiff is a near relation and a co-sharer and therefore comes in the first category, whereas the defendant does not come in that category. This being our view the appeal must prevail. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored with costs.

Appeal allowed.

v.

Bhagwan Das and others—Defendants-Respondents.

S. A. No. 751 of 1922, decided on the 31st October, 1923, from the decree of the Additional Sub-Judge, Bareilly, dated 4th April, 1922.

Agra Tenancy Act, S. 4—Land let for planting grove is not holding and rights are transferable.

A plot neither let nor held for agricultural purposes, but let for the planting of a grove is incapable of cultivation, where a grove exists on it, and the rights of such a tenant are transferable. The plot is neither land within the meaning of the Act nor a holding. (19 A.L.J.R. 616, Foll.)

But when the holdings themselves are not transferable they cannot become transferable after the planting of trees. (5 A.L.J.R. 99 and 14 A.L.J.R. 833, Dist.)

Durga Prasad—for Appellant.

N. P. Asthana—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for ejectment. The plaintiff is the zamindar and his allegation was that the defendants were non-occupancy tenants of the land on which some trees stood, and they had wrongly transferred them. The lower appellate Court has found that the land had been taken from the zamindar for planting a grove on payment of a nazrana. The grove was thickly planted and was planted about the time when the land was taken. It has been in existence for 32 years and in its present condition is incapable of cultivation. It accordingly found that defendants Nos. 3 to 6 were not non-occupancy tenants of any holding, but had the rights of grove-holders on this plot. This finding is fatal to this appeal. In section 4 of the Agra Tenancy Act holding is defined as a parcel or parcels of land held under one tenure or one lease or engagement and the word lease is defined as land which is let or held for agricultural purposes. The finding of the Court clearly shows that this plot was neither let nor held for agricultural purposes, but that it was let for the planting of a grove and a grove exists on it and it is incapable of cultivation. The plot therefore is neither land within the meaning of the Act nor a holding. There can therefore be no bar to the transferability of the rights of the defendants (vide the case of Jalesar Sahu v. Raj Mangal (1)). The finding of the Court below that under the circumstances the rights are transferable cannot be impugned.

Reliance has been placed on the case of Ganga Dei v. Badam (2) and the case of Daya Kishen v. Mohammad Wazir Ahmad (3). Both these cases however are distinguishable inasmuch as in those cases trees had been planted on agricultural holdings which had existed from before. When the holdings themselves were not transferable they could not become transferable after the planting of trees. I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Bhullen Singh—Plaintiff-Appellant

v.

Kushi Ram and others—Defendants-Respondents.

S. As. Nos. 1187 and 1188 of 1922, decided on 3rd December, 1923, from the decree of the Additional Judge, Meerut, dated 3rd May, 1922.

Evidence Act, S. 92—Vendee can give oral evidence in a pre-emption suit to explain the character of the sale deed.

In a suit for pre-emption against the vendee, the vendee can adduce evidence for the purpose of showing that a document which on its face purported to be a deed of sale was in reality a deed of relinquishment. S. 92 excludes the admission of any oral agreement or statement as between the parties to an instrument or their representatives in interest, but the plaintiff in a pre-emption suit is not such a party. [P. 230, C. 1.]

S. N. Sen—for Appellant.

K. N. Katju—for the Respondents.

Lindsay, J.:—By a document executed on the 7th of August 1920 purporting to be a sale deed, certain property was transferred by one Shib Sahai in two mahals, namely, mahal Ishk Lal and mahal Ghasi Ram.

The result of this transfer was to provoke two suits for pre-emption which have given rise to the two appeals before us. In one case the plaintiff was Challoo who is the appellant in second appeal No. 1187

In the other case the plaintiff was Bhullan Singh, the appellant in S.A. No. 1188.

It was found by the Courts below that a custom of pre-emption existed in this village.

Both courts however dismissed both the suits on the ground that the document of the 7th of August 1920 which purported to be a sale-deed was not in fact a sale-deed and was not evidence of a real transaction of sale giving rise to a right to pre-empt.

The decision of the Courts below is attacked here on the ground that they were both wrong in allowing evidence to be given regarding the nature of this deed. It has been strongly contended that on the language of section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act it was not open to the vendee to raise this question or to adduce any evidence for the purpose of showing that a document which on its face purported to be a deed of sale was in reality a deed of some other character.

That contention however appears to us to be unsustainable, regard being had to the language of section 92. That section excludes the admission of any oral agreement or statement as between the parties to an instrument or their representatives-in-interest for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding or subtracting from its terms. In no way can it be contended that either of the plaintiffs in these suits was a party to the instrument or was in any sense a representative of any party to the instrument, and we hold therefore, that it was open to the vendee as against the plaintiff, to produce evidence for the purpose of showing that the document upon which the two suits were based was not in fact a document of sale.

The evidence which was led before the Court may be put shortly as follows:—It appears that Shib Sahai who poses as the vendor in this deed had, as far back as the year 1903, brought a suit for arrears of rent against the persons who are now described in the document as the purchasers.

That suit apparently failed on the ground that Shib Sahai could not establish in fact that the defendants in the suit for arrears of rent were his tenants. It further appears that the defendants in that suit denied Shib Sahai's title. Nothing further was done until about the year 1918 when the settlement operations were going on. It seems that an application was made by the adversaries of Shib Sahai to the Settlement Officer claiming that they might be entered as proprietors.

Notice of this application was apparently given to Shib Sahai and on the 28th of April 1919 the application of the defendants was disallowed.

Thereupon the defendants, that is Khushi Ram and others, filed an appeal in the Revenue Court contesting the decision of the first Court. The appellate Court ordered a remand of the case and it was while this matter was under disposal that the document in question was executed.

The case for the defendants was that the deed, although it purports to be a deed of sale, was not in reality a deed of sale but merely a relinquishment by Shib Sahai of whatever claims he had still left over the property in consideration of payment to him of a sum of Rs. 2,500.

We may note that the plaintiffs admit that the property described in this document of the 7th of August 1920 is worth Rs. 10,000. The defendants on the other hand say that it is worth Rs. 14,000.

The Courts below came to the conclusion that the document in reality amounted to nothing more than a settlement of the dispute between the parties which was then pending in the appeal. Shib Sahai agreed to withdraw his claim on payment of the sum of Rs. 2,500 and this was effected by the execution of the document now in question. We think that the courts below were right in taking this view of the case. We are quite satisfied that the evidence which was led for the purpose of showing the character of the document was admissible and we also agree that the courts have come to a correct conclusion on the facts. The result therefore is that both these appeals fail and are dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

King-Emperor.

Cr. Rev. No. 487 of 1923, decided on the 13th August, 1923, from the order of the District Magistrate, Allahabad, dated 10th August, 1923.

(a) Penal Code, S. 147—Conviction of four out of many is not illegal.

Where there were originally 13 persons charged under S. 147, Penal Code, nine of whom have been acquitted the conviction of remaining four is not illegal, if it is found that a very large number of persons had joined in the attack.

(b) Crim. Pro. Code, S. 106—Order under, must be passed at the time of passing sentence.

An order under S. 106 must be passed at the same time when there is a conviction and passing of sentence and not at a subsequent stage.

Ram Nama Prasad—for Applicants.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is an application in revision. Two main points have been urged strongly. The first one is that inasmuch as there were originally 13 persons, nine of whom have been acquitted, the conviction of the remaining four under section 147 of the Indian Penal Code was illegal. As to this I may point out that the learned District Magistrate has gone into the question and has come to the conclusion that there can be no doubt that a very large number of persons had joined in the attack. The only doubt which he felt was as to the identity of most of the 13 persons named and he had no doubt in his mind that more than five persons had taken part in the beating. The conviction under section 147 is therefore not illegal.

The next point urged is that the order under section 106 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was improper inasmuch as no notice to show cause had been issued to the applicants. On their behalf it is contended that the proper procedure for the appellate Court to adopt was to dismiss the appeal and issue notice to the applicants to show cause, and that after they had an opportunity of showing cause, they could have been bound over under section 106. In my opinion this procedure would have been altogether ultra vires. Under section 106 whenever any person accused of rioting, assault, etc., is convicted the Court (and so also may the appellate Court) may at the time of the passing of the sentence on such persons order him to execute a bond, &c. It is clear in my mind that an order under section 106 must be passed at the same time when there is a conviction and passing of sentence. If it was passed at a subsequent stage it would have been altogether without jurisdiction. If the Magistrate had decided to start proceedings subsequently the only procedure open to him would have been that prescribed by section 107. I do not consider that on the facts the sentence of one month is in any way severe. The application is dismissed.

Revision rejected.

Partab Ahir—Plaintiff-Respondent.

S. A. No. 792 of 1922, decided on the 15th November, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Azamgarh, dated 15th February, 1922.

(a) Civ. Pro. Code, O. 41, r. 27—Additional evidence not tendered in lower appellate Court though possible, cannot be admitted in High Court in second appeal.

Where an order of Revenue Court was passed as early as the 13th of May 1921, and the appeal was disposed of by the lower appellate Court on the 15th February, 1922, and the defendant made no attempt whatsoever to tender the order of Revenue Court which was within his knowledge and power before the lower appellate Court nor was the attention of that Court directed to this matter.

Held: that it was too late for the defendant to try to tender it in the High Court. [P. 232, C. 1.]

(b) Jurisdiction—Civil or Revenue Court—Suit for declaration of joint tenancy lies in Civil Court.

A suit for a declaration that the plaintiff is a joint tenant with the defendant and is entitled to joint possession is cognizable exclusively by the Civil Court. (8 A. L. J. 1009 and 35 All. 14, Ref.). [P. 232, C. 2.]

The finding that a holding was a joint holding of the parties is one of fact. [P. 232, C. 2.]

S. S. Sastry—for Appellant.

Iqbal Ahmad—for the Respondent.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit for joint possession of the plaintiff's share in certain tenancy lands.

The main defence put forward on behalf of the defendant was that these lands were not joint tenancies at all but belonged exclusively to the defendant and that the plaintiff was the defendant's sub-tenant.

The Court of first instance dismissed the plaintiff's suit but on appeal the decree has been set aside and the suit for joint possession decreed.

It was admitted that prior to the institution of the present suit in the Civil Court the defendant No. 1 brought a suit in the Revenue Court for ejectment of plaintiff Pratab under section 58 of the Agra Tenancy Act claiming that Pratab was his sub-tenant. So far as the record before me goes there is nothing whatsoever to show what ultimately happened in the Revenue Court.

Mr. Sastry on behalf of the defendant wanted to tender before me a certified copy of an order purporting to have been passed by the Revenue Court on the 13th of May 1921 showing that after the dismissal of the civil suit the Revenue Court had decreed the suit. This order obviously was passed as early as the 13th of May 1921. The appeal was not disposed of by the lower appellate Court till the 15th of February 1922, i.e., not till after nine months. The defendant made no attempt whatsoever to tender this additional piece of evidence, which was within his knowledge and power, before the lower appellate Court nor was the attention of that Court directed to this matter. This not having been done, I am of opinion that it is now too late for the defendant to try to tender it in this Court. Under the circumstances, I am quite unable to hold that the decree of the lower appellate Court was wrong, because of a certain order, a copy of which the defendant could have tendered, but which was not tendered before that Court. It is also to be noted that there is no affidavit before me to show that that order of the Revenue Court was in fact the final order of the Revenue Court. For ought one knows, the matter might have been taken to a higher Court or may still be pending in the Revenue Court. I am therefore not disposed to admit these fresh evidence in second appeal. No such prayer was made in the grounds of appeal, nor was any application filed for tendering fresh evidence, with notice given to the defendant so that he may not be taken by surprise at the eleventh hour.

On the record as it stands there is nothing to show that the Revenue Court has passed any final decree in favour of the defendant. All that appears is that a suit was filed in respect of this very holding, and in that suit the present plaintiff clearly denied that there was any relation of landlord and tenant between the parties and pleaded that the Revenue Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit. The plaintiff's plaint as framed is a plaint which cannot be entertained by a Revenue Court at all. It asks for a declaration that the plaintiff is a joint tenant with the defendant and is entitled to joint possession. Such a suit is cognisable exclusively by the Civil Court. Vide 8 A.L.J. 1009 and 35 All. 14. I am therefore unable to hold that the Civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain this claim. Furthermore, as a suit of this kind is not cognisable by a Revenue Court section 10 of the Civil Procedure Code cannot apply, and I cannot hold that the Civil Court should have stayed proceedings in the civil suit.

The learned vakil for the appellant cited before me two cases where it has been held that if previous to the institution of the civil suit a final decree had been obtained from a Revenue Court declaring the status of one party as the tenant of the other that decree cannot be re-opened by the Civil Court. That of course is quite obvious. The Revenue Court is the proper Court for trying the question whether the relation of landlord and tenant exists or not. Once it has been found by that Court, namely that such a relation exists it is not open to the party to come to the Civil Court and establish his proprietary title. That however is not the case here, and so far as it appears no final decree has been passed in favour of the defendant. The rule of law laid down in 8 A.L.J. 695 at 699 applies.

The last point urged on behalf of the appellant was that the finding of the lower appellate Court that the holding was a joint holding of the parties, was incorrect. The question was a pure question of fact. The learned Judge has disbelieved the entire evidence of the defendant. He has believed the evidence for the plaintiff and his witnesses, and there is also the presumption of the Hindu law in favour of the plaintiff. He has also found that the plots were the occupancy lands belonging to the plaintiff's father. This finding cannot be interfered with in second appeal.

The appeal is without force and is hereby dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Abdullah and others—Appellants

v.

King-Emperor—Opposite party.

Cr. A. No. 51 of 1923, decided on 30th April, 1923, from the order of Special Sessions Judge, Gorakhpur.

(a) Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), S. 239—Sessions Judge must look to the charges themselves to see if they could be jointly tried—Result of trial need not be considered.

Sessions Court has to look to the case for the prosecution as set forth in the charges themselves and if according to that case the offences are such as could be regarded as parts of the same transaction, the Court would be justified in entering upon the trial of all the accused on the charges as framed. It need not consider what the position would be if it finally comes to the conclusion that no offence had been committed or that the offence committed was one which was excluded from its cognizance by S. 196-A of the Criminal Procedure Code. [P. 236, C. 1.]

(b) Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), S. 239—Joint trial for murder committed by members of an unlawful assembly is legal.

A joint trial of the accused is legal under S. 239 where a large number of persons are tried for the offence of wilful murder committed by the members of an unlawful assembly at a time when each of the persons is alleged to be a member of that assembly. [P. 233, C. 1.]

(c) Picketting may be an offence where agreement to stop sale of intoxicants in a bazar constituting criminal conspiracy is arrived at.

Certain national volunteers went to a small village bazar for the purpose of picketting the sale of country liquor, etc. Outside the bazar the shopkeepers and the agents of the Zamindar told them that no interference with the bazar would be tolerated. The volunteers finding themselves too few in numbers retired but their leaders distinctly told the interlocutors that they would return on the following market day. A large meeting of the volunteers was then convened by the leaders at which the persons present entered into an agreement to stop the sale of intoxicants, etc., at the bazar.

Held (1) that the agreement was an agreement to commit the offence of criminal intimidation and amounted to a criminal conspiracy;

(2) that whatever might be said in defence of peaceful picketting when undertaken in the market of a large town by individuals or by small groups of earnest and enthusiastic men or women it had no application to the present case where it was proposed to flood a small village bazar by a body of men whose mere presence there would put a stop to all business which could only be varied on with their consent or indeed with their active assistance. [P. 248, C. 1.]

(d) Sentence—Murder where accused are ignorant peasants and are misled by misrepresentations and promise of millennium—Sentence of transportation for life is sufficient.

Where the accused were ignorant peasants and were led to commit offences under S. 49 and 302 of the Penal Code by misrepresentations and preposterous promises of millennium which was to be brought about by courage and resolution on their part and where some of them believed that the person whose orders they believed they were carrying out was a worker of miracles. Held, that this was a sufficient reason for passing on the accused the lesser sentence of transportation for life. [P. 251, Cs. 1 and 2.]

(e) Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), S. 141 (3)—Common object to obstruct police in discharge of duty comes within 3rd clause.

Where the immediate object of an assembly when it reached the Police station was to obstruct by threat the police in the discharge of its duty.

Held, that the object in itself and apart from any of the other clauses of S. 141 is sufficient to bring the case within the purview of the 3rd clause of the section. [P. 249, C. 2.]

(f) Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), S. 147—Intention to attack police in certain eventualities being clear, on attempt by police to disperse assembly by force, if attack on police and murder follows, every member is liable unless his separation is proved.

One of the common objects of a crowd was to attack the police in certain circumstances. While it was passing by the Police Station the Police attempted to disperse it by force. Upon this whistles were sounded and the crowd turned round and began to throw kankar at the police and after the police had shot the 1st volley and injured a number of persons it attacked the Police Station and murdered the policemen there:

Held that every one of the accused persons who was proved to have continued as active participant in the riot after the moment when kankar began to be thrown is guilty under S. 302 read with S. 149 unless and until the evidence showed that he had separated himself from the rest before the offence of murder had been committed by anyone of them. Judgment:—Referring to the admirable way in which Counsel and the lower Court had dealt with the case, their Lordships proceeded:—

We have made the above remarks at the very outset of our judgment, because it was only proper that we should take account of an argument addressed to us on behalf of the accused generally, to the effect that the procedure adopted in placing 225 accused persons jointly on their trial has necessarily hampered each and all of them in the preparation of their defence. In this connection some comment was made regarding the comparatively short interval of time between the commitment order and the commencement of the trial at sessions. There is no question here of any alleged illegality of procedure. All the persons placed upon their trial were actually accused of the same offence, in so far at any rate as every one of them was charged with, and tried for, the offence of wilful murder committed by members of an unlawful assembly, in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, at a time when each of these persons was alleged to be a member of the said assembly, sections 302-149, Indian Penal Code. The joint trial upon this charge was therefore unquestionably legal under section 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It is quite true that the matter was one for the discretion of the trial Court: the accused persons were liable to be charged and tried together, or separately, as the Court might think fit. What has been suggested to us in argument is that the interests of justice would have been better served if the Sessions Court had seen fit to order the trial of the accused in batches, or at any rate, had insisted upon doing so unless the Public Prosecutor were prepared to withdraw the prosecution as against a very considerable number of the men committed for trial. With respect to the former alternative, it is sufficient for us to say that the practical difficulties and inconveniences in the way of duplicating, or triplicating or even further multiplying, this inevitably laborious and protracted trial were such as to make the adoption of this course practically impossible. We do not think it necessary to say more on this point. Every lawyer acquainted with the procedure in an Indian Sessions Court, and indeed any person of intelligence who even glances through the voluminous printed record which lies before us, will be driven to concur in the opinion we have expressed. The question of possible action on the part of the Public Prosecutor in reducing the number of accused, which was suggested to us in argument, is a more complicated one, and is not strictly one for our consideration. We fully appreciate the patent fact that we are dealing with an offence, or series of offences, in which the criminals concerned numbered at least 3,000. We see no reason whatever to doubt the truth of a statement, made to us in the course of argument by Mr. Kadri the very able Counsel employed to conduct the prosecution in the trial Court and to assist the learned Government Advocate at the hearing before us, that the police investigation resulted in the discovery of evidence, more or less, implicating at least 1,000 persons. There was, therefore, a very considerable amount of selection and discrimination exercised before the number of persons placed on their trial in the Sessions Court was reduced as low as 225. It was a case in which the public interest certainly demanded that the interval of time between the commission of the offence and the commencement of the sessions trial should not be prolonged further than was absolutely necessary. Those responsible for the conduct of this prosecution were working, inevitably under the circumstances, against time. The question whether the provisions of Chap. XXXVIII of the Code of Criminal Procedure (sections 492—495 inclusive), regarding the appointment and duties of "officers to be called Public Prosecutors" do not require some revision, and the further question whether the provisions as they stand might not be used so as to call into existence a more effective department for the conduct of public prosecutions in this Province, are no doubt deserving of serious consideration. In the existing state of things we doubt whether the problems presented by the investigation of this extraordinary crime and the prosecution of the criminals could have been more efficiently handled, or with greater consideration for the right of each individual accused to a thorough investigation of the charges against him personally, than has in fact been done.

[Their Lordships paid a glowing tribute to C. E. W. Sands and the Police for the spirit of fairness and moderation shown by them and expressed their appreciation of the services rendered by the Counsel on either side.]

Their Lordships then took up the question of misjoinder of charges and proceeded:—

The charges against all the accused were six in number. There was a seventh charge affecting twenty-six only out of the entire number and an 8th charge affecting the same twenty-six and twelve others in addition. These charges are set forth in detail in the opening pages of the judgment under appeal and we do propose to recapitulate them. They admit however of a certain classification. We have already spoken of the crowd which attacked the police as an assembly of persons moving in a certain formation and animated by a definite purpose. It is an essential part of the case for the prosecution that the nucleus of this crowd consisted of a body of perhaps 1,000, perhaps 1,500 persons, which set forth from the little village of Dumri Khurd, situated some two miles or rather less from Chaura police station. It is alleged as against all the accused persons that they formed part of this original assembly at the village of Dumri and that, before their departure from that place, they had entered into an agreement amongst themselves to do certain illegal acts of such a nature as to render them liable to punishment under section 120-B of the Indian Penal Code. This has been spoken of in argument as the "conspiracy charge" and we propose to refer to it hereafter under that designation. For the present, the point which we have to note is that it was an intergal part of the case for the prosecution in the Court below that the events which occurred later in the day, in the neighbourhood of Chaura police station, followed upon this alleged criminal conspiracy at Dumri Khurd in such a manner and were so connected therewith, not merely by sequence of time, but by the link of causation as to make the conspiracy at Dumri and the subsequent assault on the policemen at Chaura parts of the same transaction, within the meaning of that expression in section 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The next five charges, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, relate to what took place on the afternoon of the 4th of February, 1922, at Chaura police station and in its immediate neighbourhood. They may be described as different presentations of one and the same charge in lesser or in more aggravated forms. They start with the second charge, which simply alleges as against all the accused persons that they were members of an unlawful assembly, within the meaning of the definition in section 141 of the Indian Penal Code, at the time when force or violence was used by members of the said assembly in prosecution of the common objects thereof. This charge is therefore laid under section 147, Indian Penal Code. It is further the case for the prosecution that the force or violence thus used extended to the murder of twenty-three police and chaukidars, the plundering of property belonging to the said officials and to Government, the destruction by fire of the police station buildings and the voluntary causing of hurt to various police and chaukidars. We have therefore charges drawn up under sections 302, 395, 436 and 332, I.P.C., read in each case with section 149 of the same Code.

The 7th and 8th charges, which affect some of the accused persons only, may be grouped together. They deal with the damage inflicted on the Railway line and on the telegraph wires and are framed respectively under section 126 of the Railways Act No. IX of 1890 and under section 25 of the Indian Telegraph Act No. XIII of 1885.

There is as a matter of fact one further charge, of such slight importance that it had been almost overlooked. It affects a single one of the accused, the appellant Sikhari, and is framed under section 412, Indian Penal Code. In substance it refers back to the charge of dacoity under section 395-149, I.P.C., in which Sikhari was already involved, and alleges against him, in the alternative, that, if he was not actually concerned in the said dacoity, he was at any rate subsequently found in possession of property which had been stolen in the course of the same. The charge is somewhat loosely worded and does not allege against Sukhari the essential point that he knew that the possession of the property in question had been transferred by the commission of dacoity, but this is not a matter upon which we find it necessary to insist.

Now the case for the appellants is that no offence of criminal conspiracy was committed by any persons at Dumri Khurd on the morning of the 4th of February, 1922; or in the alternative that, if there was such conspiracy, it was not one in respect of which a prosecution could be instituted without an order in writing by the Local Government, in view of the provisions of section 196-A of the Indian Penal Code. To this contention we shall have to revert later. The point immediately before us is that, whatever offence may or may not have been committed at Dumri Khurd on the forenoon of the 4th of February, 1922, it was not one so connected with the offences committed at Chaura later in the same day that it could fairly be regarded as "committed in the same transaction" within the meaning of section 239 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Upon this plea the appellants base the further contention that there has been a misjoinder of charges, sufficient to invalidate the entire trial in the Court below. We think we do no injustice to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the very able Counsel who argued this part of the case on behalf of the appellants, when we say that it is not our impression that he seriously pressed this argument to the logical conclusion that, if we found it correct, we should have no option but to order a retrial of the entire case. He is certainly not to be blamed if he hesitated to face the possible consequences of such a contention, were it to prevail with the Court. Our own view of the question has been already indicated by the expressions we have used in setting forth the charges, but we should perhaps amplify it. When the learned Sessions Judge entered upon the trial of this case, and was faced with the question whether the provisions of section 239, Criminal Procedure Code, did or did not authorise him, not merely to try the 225 accused persons before him at one and the same trial, but to try them on each and all of the charges set forth against them under the order of the committing Magistrate, he could not possibly know what conclusion he would arrive at after hearing the whole of the evidence. He had to look to the case for the prosecution as set forth in the charges themselves. He was, therefore, for the reasons which we have already indicated, warranted by law in entering upon this trial of the 225 accused on the charges as framed. The convictions which he has recorded are warranted by the conclusions at which he arrived on the evidence. As he had to regard merely the "charges," it was not necessary for him to consider what the position would be, if he had eventually come to the conclusion, either that no offence punishable under section 120-B, I. P. C., was committed by any persons at Dumri Khurd on the forenoon of 4th February, 1922, or that if any offence was so committed it was one excluded from his cognizance by section 196-A of the Criminal Procedure Code. In any event, the acquittal of all the accused persons on the conspiracy charge would have removed any possible objection to the validity of the trial. It is possible that in certain events the prosecution may have to suffer the penalty of having attempted to prove too much, by seeing a verdict of acquittal recorded which might otherwise have been avoided.

We do not feel that we are greatly concerned at this state to discuss the form of the various charges, so long as we are satisfied that there has been no such misjoinder of charges as to force upon us the duty of vindicating the law by quashing all the convictions upon this ground alone, and the consequent responsibility of considering the question of the ordering of a new trial upon such charge or charges as we might direct to be framed. On the case for the prosecution, the three groups of charges as we have set them forth were in respect of offences committed in the same transaction within the meaning of section 239, Criminal Procedure Code. The final charge against the accused Sikhari alone, was really in the nature of an alternative to one of the others. There was nothing illegal in the procedure adopted by the trial Court. The conception we have formed of our duty in this matter is that we ought to concentrate our attention upon the one substantial charge in the case. There is not one of the appellants now before us who has been convicted upon any of the other charges, but has been also convicted of the offence of murder committed in the course of a riot and punishable under section 302/149, I.P.C. In respect of any of the appellants against whom this charge is not in our opinion satisfactorily proved, but who is not entitled to a clear verdict of acquittal upon all the charges, the only offence in our opinion established is that of simple rioting punishable under section 147, I. P. C. This offence is set forth in the second of the charges framed. As regards the conspiracy charge there are certain aspects of the case which we shall have to consider further, because of their bearing upon the important and essential question of the common object or objects of the unlawful assembly around Chaura police station referred to in the charge of murder. Otherwise we propose to concentrate our attention on the charge under section 302/149 of the Indian Penal Code and to consider whether this is established against all or any of the appellants. The question of sentence can be completely and adequately dealt with under that single charge. So far as this Court is concerned no lesser sentence than that of transportation for life can lawfully be imposed on any accused person found guilty upon that charge.

[Their Lordships expressed their appreciation of the careful manner in which the Sessions Judge had dealt with the case and remarked that the accused had not been prejudiced by a large number of persons being jointly tried.]

[Their Lordships at this stage dwelt upon the volunteer movement of Gorakhpur and showed how the tragedy which was the subject-matter of the case in hand had grown out of the activities of the so-called non-co-operation movement.]

The further portion of the judgment ran as follows:—

On the occasion of the Wednesday market—the 1st of February, 1922—a body of volunteers, thirty to forty in number, moved upon Mundera and halted outside the village in the morning, waiting to commence operations as soon as the bazar was fairly under way. The shopkeepers and the agents of the substantial landowner of the village were on the alert. The latter came out and questioned the volunteers and told them bluntly that Babu Sant Bakhsh Singh would not allow them to interfere with his market. Reading a little between the lines of the evidence there can be no doubt that any attempt at actual coercion on the part of the volunteers would have been resisted by force. Moreover, it is clear that word had been sent to the local police station, for Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh marched into Mundera with a considerable body of police and chaukidars. Before his arrival, however, the volunteers had abandoned their enterprise. In face of the resolute attitude of the agents in charge of the bazar, the volunteers felt themselves too few in number to attempt anything. They scattered and most of them returned to their homes.

Two points however require to be noticed. The leaders of the volunteers, before they went off, distinctly told their interlocutors that they would return on the following market day (Saturday, the 4th of February) in such numbers as to enforce compliance with their demands. There is naturally some room for controversy as to the precise language used; but that it was a threat, and was understood as such, is fully proved, not only by the direct evidence, but by the fact that the landholder sent a trusted agent to Gorakhpur to appeal personally to the District Magistrate for special police protection for his market on the following Saturday. There can be no doubt whatever that such an appeal was made, and that it resulted in the arrival by train at Chauri Chaura railway station, at about 9 a.m., on the 4th of February of a small body of armed police, nine muskets in all.

The other circumstance, trifling in itself but of far reaching consequence, is that a few volunteers did enter the Mundera bazar after the gathering had dispersed. There is no evidence worth speaking of that they actually did anything provocative, and we give accused generally the benefit of our belief that the volunteer enterprise had really been given up for the day and that the individuals who entered the bazar did so on private business of their own. Unfortunately, their mere presence in the bazar proved, under the circumstances, to be provocative. Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh reached Mundera under the impression of an emergency calling for action on his part and he found the persons in charge of the bazar excited and alarmed. There is some conflict of evidence as to the details of what followed. Indeed the one witness from whom one would have expected a clear and co-herent account, police constable Siddiq (the one constable who survived the massacre) is confused and self-contradictory. Taking the evidence as a whole, it seems clear to us that the Sub-Inspector was, at some time in the forenoon, at the office of the local landholder, when certain volunteers were brought before him by policemen who had found them in the bazar. There were probably only two of them; there may have been three or four, but one of them was certainly the accused Bhagwan ahir, whom we have spoken of as the "drill-instructor." The Sub-Inspector spoke roughly to the volunteers. His wrath was particularly directed against Bhagwan, whom he abused for drawing a pension from Government while taking an active part in an "unlawful association," whose ostensible object was the overthrow (no matter by what means) of the Government whose salt he was eating. There is an allegation that Bhagwan answered insolently; there is also a suggestion that the Sub-Inspector was in some way further inflamed against the man by one of the landholder's agent named Raghubar Dayal. What we are certain of is that the Sub-Inspector thoroughly lost his temper and struck the man ; we hold it proved that he gave him two cuts with a light cane, and he very probably also struck him with the open hand.

Bhagwan and any volunteer or volunteers with him thereupon decamped and left Mundera altogether. No arrests were considered necessary by the Sub-Inspector and no official report was ever made as to any collision on that date between the police and volunteers. A curious fact is that we have it, not only from the evidence of Siddiq but from a statement made by the accused Bhagwan himself (Ex. 226), that the latter voluntarily presented himself at the police station the following morning (the 2nd of February) and had an explanation with Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh. As might be expected the accounts of this explanation differ somewhat; but they agree to this extent, that explanations and apologies were tendered and received and that, as between the principal actors in this episode, the unfortunate incident seemed to have been brought to a conclusion satisfactory to both parties.

There were nevertheless other interested parties who saw in the Sub-Inspector's loss of temper and his unjustifiable action a lever which might be worked with impressive results. For what immediately followed we turn to the evidence of the approver Shikari. We agree with the learned Sessions Judge that this man was endeavouring to earn his pardon by making a clean breast of all facts within his knowledge. We find moreover abundant corroboration of all matters in his evidence which strike us as essential. He tells us that on the evening of the thwarted enterprise at Mundera, that is on Wednesday, the 1st of February, 1922, there was a small gathering at his house. Bhagwan ahir was present, and so also were ringleaders such as Nazar Ali, Lal Mohammad, Mahadeo, son of Thag, and Ramrup (barhai). What Shikari understood from the conversation which followed was that, not Bagh-wan only, but Mahadeo and Ramrup as well, had been beaten by Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh. It was asserted that Babu Sant Bakhsh Singh (the owner of the Mundera bazar) had caused them to be seized and brought to his office at Mundera, where they were beaten by the police. On this it was agreed that letters should be sent out to volunteer associations in neighbouring villages, with a view to their assembling in a body strong enough to warrant them in paying a visit to the Sub-Inspector and "asking him why he had beaten our men." Early on the following morning (Thursday, the 2nd of February, 1922) the same persons came together again at Shikari's house and as the officials and ringleaders were illiterate, a body of eleven, the witness Nakched (P. W. 125), was employed to transcribe five copies of a letter to be sent out as a summons to neighbouring volunteers. There was some discussion as to the actual place to be chosen for the proposed gathering. Someone seems to have observed, shrewdly enough, that if this were fixed in the immediate neighbourhood of Chaura police station, the Sub-Inspector would break up the gathering by arresting the volunteers piecemeal as they arrived. Eventually a threshing floor at Dumri Khurd, in the immediate neighbourhood of Shikari's house, was fixed upon for the meeting place. It was determined that the volunteers should first march to Chaura police station to settle their differences with Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh and thence proceed northwards to the Mundera bazar in order to impose their will on the recalcitrant shop-keepers of that place. There would thus be a long day's work before them, which could scarcely be undertaken fasting. Arrangements were therefore made for the collection of supplies in the shape of raw sugar which could be distributed to those attending the meeting. We have independent evidence that this was actually done. The five letters actually issued were to serve as summonses for five hundred to seven hundred and fifty men; but we note with interest that Shikari says they were confident from the outset that more than this number would assemble once the news got abroad. They expected a gathering of between two and three thousand men.

The boy Nakched was perhaps a little confused under the stress of a severe cross-examination ; but in the main he has told a consistent story, and we have no doubt he was trying to tell the truth to the best of his recollection. The account which he gave to the investigating police on the 16th of February, 1922 (vide Ex. No. 139) of the contents of the letters he was required to write was given while his memory was still fresh. As a summary of the essentials of the message it is in complete accordance with the evidence subsequently given by the witness and we are prepared to accept it as an accurate summary. It runs as follows:

"The Sub-Inspector of Chaura seeks out and beats the volunteers; therefore bring all your volunteers to Dumri. We will go and enquire from the Sub-Inspector why he makes a practice of beating the volunteers; if he wants to sent us to jail or to arrest us he may do so with all of us."

The meaning of this last phrase is obvious enough: the volunteers were to assemble in such numbers as to make it palpably preposterous for the Sub-Inspector to attempt to arrest all of them. It was suggested in argument that we ought to see in these words a declaration beforehand, on the part of the leaders of the volunteers, that one and all of them would abide faithfully by their pledge to absolute non-violence submitting meekly to arrest or to any other action which the police might take within the limits of their lawful authority. We are impressed rather with the ironic turn of the phrase and its dangerous implications. The volunteers had only to assemble in sufficient numbers, and to be resolute enough in their determination that nothing should be done to any one of them which was not done to the whole body and they impose their own will; the arresting of even a couple of thousand men was a known impossibility.

In his evidence at the sessions trial Nakched attempts a somewhat fuller statement. As we read his evidence, he purports to give from memory a complete transcript of the letters. In this version we find the provocative statement that the Sub-Inspector is seeking out the volunteers in order to beat them. The closing phrase appears in a confused form, with a reference both to beating and to imprisonment. The essential point remains the same: there was to be no beating of individuals, no arresting of individuals. In this version, however, there is a reference to a further object for the assembly; they were to go on to Mundera and stop the sale of fish and of meat.

We do not think it would help the defence if we were to insist on this fuller account of the contents of the letters as it appears at page 543 of our printed record and we are a little sceptical as to the capacity of this boy of eleven to reproduce the entire contents from memory. We think it safer to stand by the summary of essentials which he gave while his memory was comparatively fresh. The volunteers were summoned to Dumri Khurd on the strength of a preposterously exaggerated account of the assault committed by the Sub-Inspector on the accused Bhagwan; the immediate object of the assembly was that they should march in an organized body to Chaura police station and ask the Sub-Inspector what he meant by it. The meeting was fixed for Saturday morning, the 4th of February, 1922.

In the interval, further action was taken about which Shikari apparently knows little or nothing, but as to which there is plenty of evidence. The accused Lal Muhammad sent in a report to the district headquarters of the Khilafat Committee at Gorakhpur. The evidence on this point consists party of documents seized by the police, when they raided the Khilafat Office on the 5th of February, and partly of the evidence of various members of the Executive Committee of the Khilafat at Gorakhpur, whom the prosecution put into the witness-box one after another, in the hope of getting at the whole truth concerning this important aspect of the case. We do not feel that any very substantial measure of success has been attained. On one matter of detail there is a distinct conflict of testimony. Maulvi Subhanullah (P. W. 134), seems positive that Lal Muhammad either brought his written report to Gorakhpur himself, or at any rate followed it up by a personal visit. The Secretary of the Khilafat Committee, Muhammad Sulaiman Adhami (P. W. 170), does not think that Lal Muhammad came to Gorakhpur in person, and is positive that Maulvi Subhanullah is making a mistake if he says (as he apparently does) that Lal Muhammad was sent from that gentleman's house to the office of the Khilafat Committee with his letter, or written report, in his hand. There is a conflict of evidence also as to whether the paper, Ex. 95, is this report in original; indeed we are in some little doubt as to whether Lal Muhammad or any other volunteer had the capacity to draft such a document. We are beyond all question dealing with the testimony of reluctant witnesses, who were as economical of the truth as they dared to be. Certain facts are, however, fully established. Lal Muhammad did cause to be conveyed to the office of the Khilafat Committee a letter or report, of which Ex. 95 is at any rate a correct transcript. This report was sent in by hand, so that the information it conveyed could be, and undoubtedly was, supplemented by oral communication with the person or persons who carried it. The communication was one which called for an immediate answer: if any written answer was returned it has disappeared, nor can any trace of it be discovered in the correspondence registers of the Gorakhpur Khilafat Committee. Some sort of answer, oral or written, or both, was unquestionably returned.

The letter, Ex. 95, is to the effect that two volunteers, while peacefully engaged about their own marketing (the name of the bazar is not given), had been seized and severely beaten by the officer-in-charge of the local police station. "We therefore, report this matter to your worships," the letter concludes, "in order that you may come and investigate the matter. It is because of your worships that we (ham-log, i.e., the local volunteers) have not committed any offence of any sort, for whatever action we take will be after inquiring from (you) our superiors." A book has been produced (Ex. 92) which purports to be the abstract register of correspondence received at the office of the Khilafat Committee at Gorakhpur: this register the witnesses called from that Committee have (not without some apparent shuffling and hesitation) admitted to be genuine. In this register there is an entry under date the 2nd of February, 1922, of a letter received from Lal Muhammad, Secretary, Chauri Chaura, the recorded summary of which is to the effect that the Sub-Inspector in charge of Chaura police station has severely beaten two volunteers, and the "people of that place" were ready to assault the police in return, "but had been with difficulty restrained." It need scarcely be pointed out that this is not an accurate summary of Ex. 95. There are various points about the appearance of Ex. 92 calculated to suggest a doubt whether this is really the correspondence register, as kept up in the regular course of business. No abstract register of correspondence issued from the Gorakhpur Khilafat Office is forthcoming; and in face of the description of the book Ex. 92 in its own heading we are not prepared to accept the belated assertion of Niaz Ahmad Arif (P. W. 172) that this Exhibit is in fact the only register maintained at that office for correspondence received and correspondence issued.

In considering the inference to be drawn from this peculiar state of the evidence we bear in mind the fact that no official or member of the Executive Committee of the Khilafat at Gorakhpur is now on his trial before us; but we are very definitely called upon to form an opinion as to the objects with which the National Volunteers assembled at Dumri Khurd on the morning of 4th of February and as to the resolutions come to at that gathering before the meeting proceeded to take action in pursuance of the same. Looking at the matter from this point of view, we feel bound to record our opinion that the whole truth has not been disclosed in the evidence produced at this trial as to the communications which passed between the Executive Committee of the Khilafat at Gorakhpur and the local leaders of the National Volunteer associations in the neighbourhood of Chaura in the course of the 2nd and 3rd of February, 1922. In particular, we do not believe that any written answer was ever returned by or on behalf of the said Executive Committee to the communication received from Lal Muhammad. We strongly suspect, to put it no higher, that the register of correspondence issued from that office has disappeared, not because of anything which it did contain but because of what it did not contain; that is to to say, because no entry appeared therein of any written answer to Lal Muhammad's report. It follows that an oral answer was returned, and that it was of such a character that those responsible for it could not venture to reduce it to writing. Our suspicions on this point are strengthened by certain evidence, which will be noticed in due course, as to what took place at the meeting at Dumri Khurd. These considerations warrant us in putting upon Lal Muhammad's letter the sinister interpretation of which it is undoubtedly susceptible. In substance and in effect this accused reported to his "office" at Gorakhpur that the local volunteers had been roused by the outrageous conduct of the Sub-Inspector of Chaura to such a state of indignation that, if the officials would only give the word, they were prepared to teach that officer, and the police generally, a signal lesson: and requested that some one should be sent down to look into the matter.

The reply to this communication was, as we believe and have already said, sent by word of mouth. The positive evidence as to its purport is to be found in the depositions of one or two "Khilafat" witnesses, who say that it was to the effect that the volunteers should be patient. If they were speaking the truth, and a written answer had been returned to this effect, we are confident that either the writing itself would be forthcoming, or reliable secondary evidence as to its purport. We are driven to form our opinion on this point from the evidence as to what actually took place on Saturday, the 4th of February.

From early morning on that day preparations were made at Dumri Khurd for the expected gathering. The place chosen was a threshing floor in front of the house of the accused, Behari (Pasi). The local volunteers arranged the ground, sacking being spread to provide seating accommodation for the central group of leaders. Some modest provision was made for refreshments by way of baskets containing raw sugar. Flowers were collected and made into garlands for the adornment of those whom the assembly might particularly desire to honour. From about seven in the morning a steady stream of volunteers began to flow in. There is evidence scattered about the record, in the depositions of witnesses from various villages within a radius of several miles from Dumri, which shows the manner in which these men had been summoned by messages and mustered in little groups of half a dozen or so, before marching for the appointed rendezvous. Harpal, the village watchman of Dumri (P. W. 34), had received instructions beforehand. He watched the proceedings until two or three hundred men were collected, ascertained from the general trend of the conversation that the intention was to march on the Mundera Bazar and then slipped away to report the matter at Chaura police station. He says that volunteers were still streaming in when he left Dumri Khurd. The approver Shikari (P. W. 1), estimates that five or six hundred men had come together by about 8 a.m. and that the numbers had increased to about one thousand when the meeting was brought to a close by the organized body of volunteers setting out for Chaura police station. So far as we have been able to check this estimate by the evidence of other witnesses, it certainly does not appear excessive: we are satisfied that the men who set out from Dumri Khurd for Chaura police station were at least one thousand in number, and may well have been fifteen hundred.

For the proceedings at this meeting, generally spoken of in the evidence and in the judgment as "the Dumri Sabha," we have before us a very considerable body of evidence. In the first place we have the depositions of the two approvers, Shikari and Thakur. Next we find references to this matter in statements made under section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to a Magistrate, before the commencement of the enquiry preliminary to commitment, by a number of accused persons. The most important of these are the statements of Ramrup Barhai (Ex. No. 225), Bhagwan Ahir (No. 226), Mahabir Saithwar (No. 246) and Raghubir Sunar (No. 251). In the third place, we find more or less detailed accounts of the affair from three witnesses, Jakat Narain Pande (P. W. 91), Bhawani Prasad Tewari (P. W. 25) and Shankar Dayal Rae (P. W. 102). It is quite beyond question that these three men were present at the occurrences they profess to describe. The first strikes us as the sort of vain and irresponsible busy-body whom one so often finds thrusting himself to the front in connection with some political or social movement. The reception he met with on his first arrival at Dumri is enough to show that the peasantry of the neighbourhood not only respected his caste and were inclined to take him at his own valuation as a professor of religion but looked upon him as a person of some authority in connection with the non-co-operation movement. We see no reason to believe that he was ever accepted as such by the organizers of the Congress or Khilafat movement in Gorakhpur itself; nor on the other hand do we see any real ground for regarding him as a police spy, though he was accused of being one by indignant volunteers before the meeting at Dumri was over. His own account of what took him to Dumri is that he hastened to the place as soon as he heard what was going on because he had formed a low opinion of the character of local volunteers and was persuaded (from what had happened at Mundera on the previous Wednesday) that they were going to get themselves into trouble by acting contrary to the true precepts of non-violence as laid down by "Mahatmaji" Gandhi. He naturally tries to put his own conduct in the most favourable light, and we are not greatly concerned to inquire how far honest zeal for what he thought right, mingled with mere curiosity and a desire to gratify his self-importance in determining his conduct. He certainly did go to Dumri and he does seem to have exerted himself, to the best of his ability, to prevent mischief. Bhawani Prasad is a land-holder and village headman of Pokharbinda, a hamlet which had sent a contingent of volunteers to Dumri. He was on friendly terms with Sub-Inspector Guptesbar Singh and was sent for to the police station on the Saturday morning. He was relieved to find the small contingent of armed police arriving from Gorakhpur, and he went to Dumri, on the Sub-Inspector's suggestion, to see what was really happening and to warn the volunteers that they had better abandon whatever enterprise they were meditating, whether against Chaura police station or Mundera Bazar, especially in view of this reinforcement which the police had received. Rae Shankar Dayal is a resident of the Ballia district who was making a living in Gorakhpur out of District Board contracts and a contract which he held in connection with the Mundera Bazar. It was his interest in this matter which took him to Dumri to see what the volunteers were really doing. He has played an ambiguous part in this trial and portions of his evidence have been severely commented on by the learned Sessions Judge. We are satisfied that he may be regarded as a witness distinctly friendly to the accused persons.

The effect of this evidence as a whole is tocorroborate the account of the meeting at Dumri given by the approver Shikari, at least in its broad outlines, sufficiently to enable us to feel certain of its straightforwardness and general accuracy. Of the present accused, the men who took the lead were Nazir Ali and Lal Muhammad; also, in a lesser degree, Shyam Sunder and Abdulla alias Sukhi; with these must be placed Shikari himself, a man of the name of Indarjit whom the police had not been able to arrest up to the time of the trial in the Court below and an ascetic with a pair of tongs, an article commonly carried by religious mendicants of a certain class. He is frequently referred to in the evidence; and was probably a mischief-maker from a distance. No one seems to know his name. Jagat Narayan Pande and Shankar Dayal were cordially received on their arrival, garlanded and permitted to address the meeting. The latter was apparently mistaken for some emissary from headquarters whom the volunteers were expecting, under the description of "the Ahrauli Babu." Both tried to persuade the gathering to break up and to abandon their expressed intention of proceeding in a body to Chaura police station and Mundera Bazar. Jagat Narayan especially exerted himself in this sense, appealing to the precepts of "Gandhiji" and to the fact that armed police had reached Chaura. He was violently opposed by Nazar Ali, also by Lal Muhammad, Shyam Sundar and Abdulla alias Sukhi. He was told that he was no better than a police spy, ridiculed, abused and finally turned out of the meeting with contumely. Eventually Nazar Ali carried the entire meeting with him in a resolution that they were to march in a body, first to Chaura police station, to ask the Sub-Inspector why he had beaten two volunteers, and thence to Mundera Bazar to stop the sale of intoxicants, of meat and of fish. These objects were to be pursued unflinchingly and carried through in the teeth of any opposition that might be encountered. No one was to start on the expedition who was not prepared to venture his life on the hazard. When challenged to do so by Nazar Ali, all those present bound themselves by oaths to persevere to the end. Anyone who turned back after setting forth with the rest was to be considered, if a Hindu, to have eaten cow's flesh, if a Musalman, the flesh of swine. What may be a coarse variant of the oath, but is more likely to be a description of any defaulter, is mentioned by Shikari as particularly applicable to anyone "who should retreat from before the bullets at the Thana." The assembly was a large one and it is easily conceivable that more than one form of oath was used. The coarser one, be it oath or description, was abhorrent in its terms and might well appeal more particularly to those elements in the crowd, drawn from the lowest strata of society, which are abundantly represented in the list of appellants before us.

On all the points hitherto set forth the evidence as to the proceeding at this

Dumri Sabha is clear, consistent and overwhelming. There remains, however, one detail which calls for separate consideration. When Shikari made his first statement before a Magistrate on the 16th of March, 1922, he said, speaking of a late stage of the meeting. "In the meantime two Muhammadans, one of whom was wearing spectacles, came there. I do not know where they lived. They took out a piece of paper and began to read it. Then they began to sing. In this song the names of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali were uttered, again and again, and it was about their imprisonment. After singing the song they went away to the west. Then we got up and passing along the raised borders of the fields reached the road." In his evidence at the trial, after speaking of the ejection of Pandit Jagat Narayan from the meeting and the departure of Rae Shankar Dayal—it is curious to note that he ignores Bhawani Prasad altogether—Shikari goes on to state—"Two other men came. one wearing green glasses who was of my stature, but older, about 32, who from his words appeared to be a Musalman; the other was younger than I—I cannot say whether he was a Hindu or a Musalman. The man with glasses began to read from a slip of paper, singing 'we are going for two years each.' We understood going to jail. Then Nazar Ali stood and publicly administered an oath."

On the 13th of March, 1922, the accused Bhagwan ahir made a statement before a Magistrate, which contains the following passage:—"Then two Muhammadans wearing spectacles came there. They began to sing a song describing the deeds of Shaukat Ali and Muhammad Ali. On hearing the song all became angry and said, 'Come, we will all go to the thana."

Four days later the accused Mahabir, son of Lalsa Saitwar, in a statement similarly recorded, told the Magistrate:—"Two Musalmans came there. One of them was wearing spectacles and the other had a beard. They came there and began to sing. After this all the volunteers, who were about three thousand, got up and started from there crying out, Mahatma Gandhi ki jai."

The accused, Raghubir, son of Jaddu, is a Sunar by caste, a man of higher social position than the bulk of the accused. On the 4th of March, 1922, he told a Magistrate as follows:—"Lectures were delivered. There was a Babu who in his lecture said that we should not go either to Mundera Bazar nor to the police station. If we went in a body there would be a riot. But no one listened to him. A Miyan, whose name and residence I do not know, delivered a lecture and asked his hearers whether they were ready to die. They replied that they were ready. Then all started from there."

It would be quite possible for us, on the evidence which we have already reviewed, to record our finding as to the nature of the agreement come to by the volunteers assembled at Durmi Khurd and whether that agreement did or did not amount to a criminal conspiracy. We think it better, however, to proceed with the narrative of events. The evidence as to what the volunteers agreed amongst themselves to do cannot be altogether dissociated from the evidence of what they actually did. We shall have to consider, in connection with certain statements made by the approvers Shikari and Thakur, if their testimony is or is not borne out by the subsequent conduct of the volunteers.

Up to a certain point there is no room for controversy as to the course of events. When the volunteers left the threshing-floor at Dumri, they made their way along the field boundaries to the broad, unmetalled road which runs from Gorakhpur to Deoria, by going eastward along which they would come to the Chaura police station, rather less than two miles distant. On this road the men were got into some sort of rough formation. The services of drill-instructor Bhagwan were requisitioned for this purpose. Flags which had been prepared beforehand were sent to the front and the crowd began to move under the guidance of their "officers," who halted them and moved them on again by the sound of whistles. They were in an excited mood, continually raising triumphant cries and acclamations. At a point roughly about half way to Chaura they came to Bhopa Bazar, where a road branches off to the left, that is to say in a northerly direction, towards a railway crossing, beyond which it leads directly to Mundera Bazar. This was the route which the crowd would have followed if they had not resolved to visit Chaura police station before going to Mundera. At this point they were met by the witness Awadhu Tewari, a servant of Babu Sant Bakhsh

Singh, the proprietor of the Mundera Bazar. The evidence of this witness as to what he saw at Bhopa corroborates Shikari. The approver says that by that time the crowd had swollen to a total of 2,500 or 3,000 men. Awadhu puts the number considerably higher, but is probably exaggerating. He says the crowd came towards him carrying flags and raising triumphant cries. The leaders appeared to him to be the accused Nazar Ali and Shyam Sunder and the approver Shikari. He gives an interesting and obviously genuine account of his conversation with them, when he endeavoured to persuade them to turn back or to disperse. Nazar Ali spoke with great insolence and remarked in an ironical tone that he was going on to the police station to get a beating. He raised his flag and the crowd moved on, still crying out "Victory". The witness hurried to the police station and told the Sub-Inspector what he had seen. In the meantime the crowd moved on as far as a building often referred to in the evidence as the factory of Lala Halwai. This brought them close to the police station enclosure which lies in an angle, where a short length of metalled road turns northward from the highway between Gorakhpur and Deoria and leads to a railway crossing and the bazar of Chaura, beyond which it proceeds to Mundera Bazar. The police station enclosure extends practically from the Gorakhpur Deoria highway on the south to the railway crossing and the line of the railway on the north side. The entrance to the police station is on the east, that is to say opening on to the short length of metalled road leading northwards from the highway to the level crossing. Opposite this entrance, and across the metalled road, were a few buildings, including the private quarters of the Sub-Inspector in charge of the police station. According to Shikari the crowd was continuously increasing in numbers as they moved from Bhupa Bazar towards Chaura. We unhesitatingly accept his evidence as proving that when the crowd came to a halt beyond Lala Halwai's factory it was over 3,000 strong. Shikari says "they were in ranks overflowing the road on either side". He adds:—'When we came to the factory we knew there was danger and that there was a guard with guns at the thana (police station). We were ready to sacrifice our lives. We saw that the darogha (the Sub-Inspector in charge of the police station, i.e., Gupteshar Singh) was standing with police and chaukidars. We supposed he was standing there to beat us. We went on because we considered ourselves to be in overwhelming numbers; and what could he do to us." We ought perhaps to explain that the vernacular word used by the witness, which had been translated "to beat", is a word of wide significance, meaning also "to strike" and even "to kill:" it would undoubtedly include striking with bullets or other missiles as well as the infliction of blows in hand-to-hand combat.

To resume our narrative: at this point the witness Sardar Harcharan Singh came forward from the direction of the police station to meet the crowd. A conference took place between him and their leaders. He estimates the number of the crowd at three to four thousand. Their leaders appeared to him to be Nazar Ali, Shyam Sunder, Shikari and the unknown ascetic carrying a pair of tongs who has been referred to elsewhere. He found the crowd in a singular state of fierce excitement. He says their leaders addressed him in a tone which was anything but respectful. They told him plainly that they were resolved at all costs to go to the Chaura police station and thence through the Chaura Bazar, through the village of Bale, to Mundera Bazar. The witness persuaded them to wait while he went to speak with the Sub-Inspector. It must be remembered that the police occupied at this moment a position which was strategically sound. They were drawn up across the highway, the breadth of which would presumably be commanded by the muskets of the armed police. These were the men on whom Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh would have to rely in the event of an encounter. The four or five men of the civil police whom he seems to have kept about him would scarcely count for anything as a fighting force. He had with him also, so far as we can gather, 40 or 50 chaukidars or village watchmen, being in part men whom he may have called in to the police station that morning in anticipation of trouble, and in part men whose turn it was to go to the police station on that day to draw their pay. These men were efficiently enough armed for an encounter at close quarters with the brass-bound lathis of stout bamboo which formed part of their official equipment. They were, however, a mere collection of village watchmen, wholly unused to acting together in numbers. The records of dacoity cases in this Court afford abundant evidence of the slight reliance which can be placed upon an assemblage of village watchmen as a fighting force. On the other hand no one who examines this record can fail to realise something of the impression produced on the minds of those who saw the crowd at close quarters, not merely by their numbers but by the spirit which animated them. Bhawani Prasad after seeing them at Dumri advised the Sub-Inspector to bow his head to the storm and let the day go by. He evidently believed that successful opposition to the march of the volunteers was out of the question; that it would be better to let them work their will, for that one day, in Mundera Bazar and to see what could be done subsequently in the way of re-establishing order. Sardar Harcharan Singh was deeply perturbed. We do not think that anything in his conduct bears out the imputations of treachery and double-dealing which have been cast upon him. He returned to the Sub-Inspector, after his interview with the leaders of the volunteers, with the conviction plainly on his mind that there was no stopping these men if they moved forward, as they were evidently determined to do. We take it that there was perceptible in the spirit of this crowd that sort of magnetic force which the ancient Greeks ascribed to supernatural influences, and which has often been noted as emanating from an army destined to be victorious in an impending encounter. Psychologically it has its basis in the recognition on the part of each member of the force that those around him are animated by the same resolution which he feels in himself: he knows that if he elects to go forward, he will not go forward alone. Sardar Harcharan Singh believed that he could exercise sufficient influence over the crowd and its leaders to ensure their marching, peacefully and without disorder, past the police station, if they were allowed to proceed in this way towards their destination at Mundera Bazar. He apparently received some assurance to this effect from the leaders. He says that, in communicating his views to the Sub-Inspector, he suggested that it would be easier "to deal with the crowd" after they had passed the police station.

If Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh had followed resolutely the plain dictates of duty, if he had continued to bar the road against the advance of the crowd and had offered them a reasonable time in which to disperse, under threat of opening fire in the event of their refusal, his chances would have depended on the possible intimidating effect of two or three volleys delivered at close quarters into the crowd massed along highway and "over-flowing," as Shikari says, "the road on either side." If the crowd broke in panic, the miscellaneous force of chaukidars might have been useful enough in completing their dispersal, and possibly in arresting their leaders. If the resolution of the crowd held firm, we very much doubt whether, with the force and with the weapons at his disposal, Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh could have prevented the dispersal of his force by sheer weight of numbers, their isolation and subsequent massacre.

The matter was not put to the test. The unfortunate Sub-Inspector is not to be blamed, or at any rate to be severely blamed, if his resolution gave away. He had to consider, not only the chances of an actual conflict, but the subsequent justification of his own action against the flood of adverse criticism which would undoubtedly have been let loose upon him. He accepted the advice of Sardar Harcharan Singh, withdrew his force from across the highway and fell back within the police enclosure. From that moment he and those with him were doomed. The crowd so far kept their express or implied compact with Sardar Harcharan Singh, that they moved in more or less orderly formation along the highway to the south of the police station and, turning to their left, began to file past the thana gate towards the railway crossing, and on beyond into the Chaura Bazar. From this point we have to deal with evidence about which there has been some controversy. We think it useless to enter upon a detailed analysis of all the items of evidence upon which our conclusions are founded. Certain matters of detail must remain in doubt; but as to the main course of events we believe it possible to formulate conclusions quite sufficient for the determination of all the issues set before us.

It must be remembered that, when Nazar Ali and Lal Muhammad called the volunteers together, they had not done so merely in order to carry out their previous threats against the vendors of intoxicants, of meat and of fish in the Mundera Bazar. They had got together their men on the understanding that they were to go to Chaura police station and have it out with the Sub-Inspector about the matter of the beating of the volunteers. We know that highly exaggerated statements had been put about on this subject. Accordingly, while numbers of the crowd were continuing on their way towards the railway crossing and Mundera Bazar, some of their leaders, with a considerable body of followers, came to a halt in front of the open gate of the police station and demanded to see the Sub-Inspector. Matters about which there has been considerable controversy are the numbers of the men who thus came to a halt and the question whether, as the movement of the crowd continued, there was ever at any moment a perceptible interval of space between the group which was halted in front of the police station and the rest of the crowd. It cannot appear surprising to any one who endeavours to form a mental picture of the scene that the available evidence on question of this sort should be conflicting. We are prepared to believe that the number of those who definitely halted in front of the thana gate, to have it out with the Sub-Inspector, did not exceed three hundred. Events moved rapidly: a crowd of three to four thousand men cannot get along very fast by a narrow street and over a railway crossing; we very much doubt whether there was at any moment a clear interval of space between those who were still moving on northwards and those, who, whether of set purpose or out of mere curiosity, lingered about the eastern front of the police station. The evidence satisfies us that the demand for an explanation in the matter of the beating of a volunteer, or of volunteers, was made in insolent and over-bearing tones and that Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh adhered to the policy which he had adopted by speaking the crowd fair. He told them that the man whom he had beaten (the accused Bhagwan) was not a brother of theirs; that he was a Government pensioner and might therefore fairly be regarded as subject to his (the Sub-Inspector's) authority. There are statements here and there on the record which attribute to the Sub-Inspector words and expressions of more object apology. Whatever he said, his remarks were received by the crowd, not merely with satisfaction, but with insolent and mocking triumph. Numbers of witnesses depose to a coarse jest which passed from mouth to mouth in the crowd, no doubt with slight variations of form, ascribing abject terror to the Sub-Inspector personally, to the police generally and even to that abstract entity referred to as "the Government." Along with this came a derisive clapping of hands, similar to that which had driven Pandit Jagat Narayan from the assembly at Dumri. Some of the crowd which had halted by the police station gate began to move northwards, but we are quite satisfied that the gateway was still beset by numbers of the crowd when the patience of the much tried Sub-Inspector gave way. The man is dead, and we shall never know with certainty what was passing in his mind. We can well believe that he was roused to anger by the taunts of the crowd, their coarse jets and their derisive hand-clapping. It is quite conceivable, however, that it was precisely these taunts which brought home to him the disadvantages of the position into which he had allowed himself to drift. After all, the armed guard had been sent out, not to defend him personally, but in order that he might use it to protect the licensed vendors and other shop-keepers of the Mundera Bazar against terrorism and mob violence. The organised crowd of volunteers was now moving steadily on towards Mundera, while the Sub-Inspector himself was practically blockaded inside his own police station by the crowd which still hung about the gate way. If the volunteers achieved their threatened purpose in Mundera that day, and still more in the not improbable event of the baser elements of the crowd getting out of hand there and plundering shops or the like, he would have to answer to his superiors for the remissness by which he had allowed these things to happen. He may well have felt, and we think that in all human probability he did feel, that the first and most urgent duty incumbent upon him at that moment was to recover his own freedom of action by clearing the road immediately in front of the police station. He ordered a number of chaukidars forward for this purpose. As might be expected, the evidence regarding the brief and confused scene which followed is somewhat conflicting. The crowd undoubtedly scattered before the advance of the chaukidars; there are witnesses who speak of them as running in different directions. In the main, however, the natural tendency of the crowd would be to press northward towards the railway crossing, that is in the direction of their own reinforcements. Hence we have some of the witnesses who speak of the chaukidars as driving the crowd towards the railway crossing, which would in itself be a futile thing for the police to have done. What precise degree of violence was used by the chaukidars it is impossible to determine. Sardar Harcharan Singh, who was in as good a position to observe what happened as any other witness, will not admit that the chaukidars actually struck any one: he describes them as thumping the ends of their lathis on the ground, which is a well known and frequently adopted method of breaking up, or moving on, a crowd by threatening them with painful, but not serious, injury to their feet. There is no doubt a good deal of evidence to the effect that some of the chaukidars "beat" some of the volunteers, and we are prepared to take it that blows were struck. What seems to us the one crucial fact which stands out in plain relief from the evidence is that the crowd generally, and more particularly the volunteers who constituted the back-bone of the crowd and the leaders of those volunteers, were prepared beforehand for just such a contingency. As the cry was passed along that the chaukidars were beating the volunteers, whistles were sounded and, upon this preconcerted signal, the whole crowd swung back upon the police station. The men spread themselves out along the railway line, arming themselves with kankur and brick-bats from the ballast, which missiles were also carried down towards the eastern front of the police station. A steady hail of missiles began to overwhelm the scanty police force, already disorganised and manœuvred into an untenable position. The firing of the first volley in the air was met by a cry that "Mahatmaji Gandhi" was working miraculously in favour of the volunteers and was turning the bullets to water. We have plenty of evidence on this record as to the wide-spread belief in this gentleman's miraculous powers. We have no doubt that such a cry was raised and that it put the finishing touch to the resolution of the mob. When the police began to fire in earnest, and two of the rioters had been shot down and others wounded, the only result was to inflame this resolution into fury. What followed has been already told.

In the light of these events we must now go back to the question, what was it that the volunteers assembled at Dumri agreed to do? The case laid before us by the defence may be fairly summed up as follows. The agreement undoubtedly was that the volunteers should go first to Chaura police station and thence to the Mundera Bazar. At the former place they were to submit to Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh a sober and dignified remonstrance against his illegal conduct in assaulting individual volunteers. They were to offer themselves to him for arrest in a body, if he was prepared to act upon the view that under the order of Government every enrolled volunteer was ipso facto liable to arrest and prosecution. When this piece of business was satisfactorily settled, they were to move on to Mundera Bazar and there, by peaceful persuasion exercised towards the licensed vendors of intoxicating liquor and drugs, and towards any persons whom they might find attempting to purchase the same, put a stop to the public sale of these harmful intoxicants. They were at the same time to stop the sale of meat and of fish, either absolutely or unless the vendors submitted to the sweeping reduction in price of which we have already spoken. As a matter of fact this latter alternative cannot be seriously considered. Everyone must have known that meat and fish would not be sold at the price suggested by the volunteers and the idea of obtaining meat and fish at reduced prices had by this time been wholly superseded by the idea of punishing the vendors of these commodities in Mundera Bazar for their contumacy by closing their shops altogether. All the evidence on the point is simply and plainly to the effect that the volunteers were to stop the sale of meat and of fish.

On this the first comment we have to make is, that the very idea of a body of 3,000 men or more controlling the shops in the Mundera Bazar by means of peaceful persuasion is on the face of it almost grotesque. Whatever may be said in defence of peaceful picketting, when undertaken in the market of a large town by individuals, or by small groups of earnest and enthusiastic men or women, has no application whatever to the proposed flooding of a small bazar like Mundera by a body of a men whose mere presence there would put a stop to all business which could only be carried on with their consent, and indeed with their active assistance. Secondly we cannot deal with the question of the object of the volunteers in moving on Mundera Bazar without taking into consideration the events of the previous Wednesday. The expedition of Saturday, February 4th, was in plain fulfillment of the threats which had been used by Nazar Ali and other leaders of the volunteers on the previous market day. So far as this part of the case is concerned, we have no doubt that the agreement come to at Dumri to stop the sale of intoxicants, of meat and of fish in the Mundera Bazar was, under the circumstances, an agreement to commit an offence punishable with rigorous imprisonment for 2 years at least, namely, the offence of criminal intimidation under section 506, I.P.C.

As regards the visit to Chaura police station, it may perhaps be necessary to distinguish between the intention of those who organised the movement and the purpose of the great mass of the crowd who gave their adhesion to the same. Lal Muhammad, Nazar Ali and those who were with them had used very exaggerated versions of the Sub-Inspector's violence towards the volunteers in order to get together the largest possible gathering of their supporters. They were taking them to Chaura for the avowed purpose of asking the Sub-Inspector why he beat volunteers. To the minds of the great majority of the crowd this expression, we have no doubt, carried very much the same significance as that conveyed by the corresponding English phrase in the historic rhyme, which tells how the Cornish men proposed "to know the reason why" Bishop Trelawny was being persecuted by King James II. At the same time the purpose actually uppermost in the minds of those who organised this demonstration was to overawe the police at Chaura into quiescence, before the crowd moved on the Mundera Bazar, in order that they might be certain of being able to work their will there without interference.

From every point of view the agreement come to amounted to criminal conspiracy. There has been much criticism before us, directed against the drafting of the conspiracy charge, and that criticism is not altogether without foundation. As we read the charge, the illegal acts which the accused are alleged to have agreed amongst themselves to do fall under two distinct heads :—

(a) to overawe the police by force or show of force,

(b) to beat the police, in consequence of what the Sub-Inspector and his subordinates had previously done at Mundera on the 1st of February.

The second part of the charge, as thus stated, is not sustainable, if only for the reason that when Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh caned the accused, Bhagwan Ahir, he was not acting in the discharge of his duty. The first part of the charge is in our opinion borne out by the evidence. We have also expressed our opinion that the agreement come to as to what was to be done by the crowd when they reached Mundera amounted to criminal conspiracy, although that is not expressly set forth in the charge. As a matter of fact, although we are prepared technically to affirm the convictions recorded under section 120-B, I.P.C., except where we have arrived at the conclusion that in the case of a particular appellant the evidence is insufficient to support any of the charges, the question is to our minds one of little more than academic importance. What we really have to determine is whether Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh was warranted by law in the action which he took that afternoon at Chaura police station, and what was the common object of the crowd there assembled, at least from the moment when they began to discharge volleys of missiles against the police.

On the first point we have in substance already expressed our opinion. A statement has been made in evidence that, before calling upon the chaukidars to disperse the assembly in front of the thana gate, Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh made some attempt to issue a formal command directing the assembly to disperse. It is likely enough that the unfortunate Sub-Inspector did try to strengthen his own position by formal compliance with the provisions of section 127, Criminal Procedure Code. It would have been no more than a formal compliance at most, and the evidence on point is not particularly convincing. We are, however, abundantly satisfied that, from the moment the crowd of volunteers left Dumri Khurd, right up to the time when they began to file past the gate of Chaura police station, they not merely constituted an unlawful assembly, but were conducting themselves throughout in such a manner as to show the firmest possible determination not to disperse if called upon to do so. The Sub-Inspector was, therefore, abundantly justified, under section 128, Criminal Procedure Code, in attempting the dispersal of the crowd at the moment when he did so. If he failed in his duty at all, it was in not having done so some time before. Arguments which have been addressed to us at the hearing of this appeal only serve to suggest the storm of criticism which the Sub-Inspector would have provoked if he had resolutely done his duty, as we conceive it, by barring the further advance of the crowd before they reached the southern boundary of the police station. In this connection we are bound to note the great stress laid in argument before us on the fact that the volunteers set forth on this expedition were, generally speaking, unarmed. We agree that the evidence justifies the conclusion that they did so, though we are not prepared to say that numbers of those who joined the crowd on the march were similarly unarmed. It may be matter for consideration also how far the flags mounted on staffs, carried in front of the crowd, were capable at need of being used as weapons. We do think, however, that those responsible for organising this movement did intend that the volunteers should advance on the police station without weapons and that, in the main, they succeeded in carrying out this purpose. This finding in no way conflicts with the findings we have recorded as to the unlawful character of the assembly. The crowd was formidable enough, without carrying weapons, to have overwhelmed any resistance offered by the small police force, provided only they showed sufficient courage and resolution. If their resolution had failed them and they had scattered, after suffering a number of casualties from the muskets of the police, the fact that they carried no weapons would no doubt have been used to support a story of the wanton massacre of peaceful demonstrators by the agents of a ruthless Government.

The immediate object of the assembly as it reached the police station was to threaten and to obstruct Sub-Inspector Gupteshar Singh and the policemen with him in the discharge of their duty, an offence punishable under section 152, I.P.C., an object sufficient in itself, and apart from any of the other clauses of section 141 of the same Code, to bring the matter within the purview of the third clause of the said section. We have, however, already indicated our opinion that a further and more dangerous purpose lurked behind. Shikari stated in his evidence that the resolution come to at Dumri was that, after asking the Sub-Inspector why he had beaten volunteers, they should beat him if his answer was unsatisfactory. The approver Thukur stated that the agreement they had come to was that if he (the Sub-Inspector) "beat us we should beat him." We are asked to disbelieve these statements on the strength of various arguments based, in part, upon a comparison of the evidence given by the approvers at the sessions trial with previous statements which they had made in the Magistrate's Court, or elsewhere. This evidence, however, and particularly Thakur's version of the scheme as it presented itself to the minds of the volunteers, fits in too well with what actually occurred at Chaura for us to feel any doubt that these controverted statements are substantially true. The instructions which had come down to the volunteers from their superiors, by what channel we do not know, were that they were not to be the first to use violence; but that, if the police used force, they were to be at liberty to retaliate in such manner as they might consider best and most effective. The evidence as a whole leaves no doubt whatever in our minds on this point. We know also that the objects which the volunteers had set before them for accomplishment, at Chaura first, and afterwards at Mundera, were such as must sooner or later provoke the most long suffering of police officers to the forcible use of his lawful authority against the lawless crowd.

An intention to assault the police in certain eventualities was therefore part of the common object of the whole assembly of volunteers from the time they left Dumri. From the moment the whistles sounded and the crowd turned back and commenced their organised, and, to the extent which we have indicated, their premeditated, attack on the police station, the object of every member of the crowd was unquestionably to cause the utmost hurt in his power to any policeman on whom he could succeed in laying hands. After the first effective volley had been fired, and when the crowd continued their attack and pressed it home in face of the casualties they had suffered, their object was, beyond possibility of doubt or contradiction, to do simply what they did, namely, to take life, in revenge for life. The crowd which stormed the police station and massacred the policemen and chaukidars was the same crowd which had commenced the attack with volleys of missiles. The charge drawn up under sections 302-149, I.P.C., is fully established as against any one of the accused persons who is proved by evidence to have continued an active participant in the riot after the moment when kankar began to be thrown, unless and until it can be inferred from credible evidence that he separated himself from the rest before the offence of murder had been committed by any one of them.

Passing on to consider the cases of individual appellants, we find it convenient to depart from the alphabetical order followed by the learned Sessions Judge. Up to certain point at any rate, it appears to us that we are able to obtain a clearer and more logical view of the effect of the evidence as a whole by grouping the accused persons together, as far as possible, under the head of the villages in which they reside. The prosecution believed that they had evidence in their possession to support the conclusion that contingents of volunteers from no less than sixty villages, situated within a radius of fifteen miles or so from Chaura police station, took part in the final encounter with the Police. The list of appellants now before us contains representatives from a large proportion of these villages; but considerable groups come from each of five or six particular localities which have consequently assumed a special importance in the history of the case. We propose to take up these groups first.

We begin with the villages of Dumri Khurd, which was the rendezvous of the volunteers and from which the nucleus of 1,000 to 1,500 men set forth on their expedition to Chaura police station and Mundera Bazar. The learned Sessions Judge had before him no fewer than 31 accused persons from this village. He found the evidence against six of them insufficient to warrant a conviction—a fact which in itself suggests to our minds that the prosecution net had been spread a little too widely, so far as this village is concerned. One feature common to practically all the accused from this village is that they are implicated in the evidence given by the approver Shikari. The circumstances under which this man made his appearance in the witness-box are sufficiently set forth in the judgment under appeal. He proved himself an intelligent and even plausible witness. His statement, as we have been taken through it, reads convincingly. We have no hesitation in agreeing with the learned Sessions Judge that Shikari did take that part in the events referred to in his evidence which he ascribed to himself, possibly even a somewhat more prominent part. In the main, as we have already stated, we are satisfied that the witness had made up his mind to earn his pardon honestly, by making a clean breast of the facts so far as known to him. At the same time we are entirely in agreement with the principle which the learned Sessions Judge has himself laid down, that this is not a case in which the Court would think of departing from the general rule of practice which requires some reliable corroboration of the evidence of an accomplice, before it will accept that evidence as sufficient proof of the guilt of a particular accused. In certain instances the learned Sessions Judge has himself found reason to suspect that Shikari may have stretched a point against particular neighbours of his, for the sake of gratifying an antecedent grudge. Apart from this, the man was obviously under a considerable temptation to introduce into his story the names of any of his own fellow villagers against whom he believed that the investigating police officers were entertaining serious suspicions. His failure to do so might, according to the mentality of a person of his class, endanger his own pardon by creating a suspicion in the minds of the police that he was endeavouring to shield neighbours of his own, about whose doings he could not well, profess ignorance. We have made these general remarks because, upon a review of the entire evidence against the Dumri men and a further sifting of that evidence, we have come to the conclusion that the doubts entertained by the learned Sessions Judge regarding the adequacy of the corroboration forthcoming against six of these men should have been extended to a considerably larger number.

We have now to consider the appropriate sentence to pass on each of those appellants in respect of whom we have affirmed the conviction on the capital charge, namely, that under section 302/149 of the Indian Penal Code. The law allows us a certain discretion. We are empowered to confirm the sentence of death in each case which has been passed by the trial Court; or we can set aside that sentence and substitute for it one of transportation for life. The exercise of this discretion is subject to the same condition by which the learned Sessions Judge felt himself to be bound. In every case of a conviction on a charge of murder the law regards sentence of death as the normal and appropriate punishment. Where the Court sees fit to pass the lesser sentence of transportation for life it must record its reasons for so doing.

We do not, however, agree with the learned Sessions Judge that it is impossible to formulate such reasons in respect of any of the appellants in this case whose conviction on the capital charge we have affirmed. We do not think it expedient to say too much on this point, for we in no way desire to extenuate the savage nature of the crime or to come forward as apologists for the lawlessness of the crowd. We take account nevertheless of the fact that this crime grew out of a political agitation. The appellants are in the main ignorant peasants; the great majority of them were drawn into the business by misrepresentations of fact and preposterous promises concerning the millennium of "Swaraj," the arrival of which was to be forwarded by courage and resolution on their part. Some indeed were apparently influenced by the belief that Mr. Gandhi was a worker of miracles. We cannot take leave of the case without an uneasy feeling that there are individuals at large at this moment, men who have not even been put on their trial in connection with this affair, whose moral responsibility for what took place at Chaura police station on the afternoon of February 4th, 1922, is at least equal to that which rests upon such men as Nazur Ali and Lal Muhammad, who acted as leaders openly, in the light of day, and at least placed their own lives on the hazard along with the rest.

These are sufficient reasons, in our opinion, to warrant the course we propose to take. We reserve the supreme penalty of the law for the ringleaders and for those against whom we find specific acts proved by the evidence such as would have bound us to convict them on a charge of murder, apart from the special provisions of section 149 of the Indian Penal Code. As to these we find nothing which can in our view warrant any other sentence than that of death. Against the remainder we pass the only other sentence permissible to us by law, that of transportation for life.

We propose to go a step further than this. In respect of a considerable number of the men whom we are sentencing to transportation for life we have formed the opinion that their cases are fit to be considered with a view to the exercise of the clemency of the Crown.

Their Lordships concluded their judgment by confirming the lower Court's sentence in the case of nineteen accused and varying it in that of others of whom 38 were released.

LINDSAY AND SULAIMAN, JJ.

Zamani Begam—Defendant-Appellant

v.

Khan Muhammad Khan — Plaintiff-Respondent.

F. A. F. O. No. 116 of 1923, decided on the 21st November, 1923, from an order of the District Judge, Farrukhabad, dated 10th April, 1923.

(a) Mahomedan Law — Pre-emption — Second demand to vendor is sufficient where possession has not passed to vendee.

Where possession of the property had not passed to the vendee, held: that the second demand made to the vendor was quite sufficient. [P. 252, C. 1.]

(b) Mahomedan Law — Pre-emption — Right arises even on complete irrevocable contract of sale.

A right of pre-emption arises not only when an out-and-out sale has been completed but also when a complete contract of sale (without any option in the vendor) has been made. [P. 253, C. 1.]

A. P. Dube—for Appellant.

S. Raza Ali—for Respondent.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. The right of pre-emption was originally based both on an alleged custom and on the Muhammedan Law. Both the Courts below have found that the existence of custom has not been established in this case. That finding is in no way challenged in appeal and must therefore be accepted as final.

On the question of the applicability of the Muhammedan Law the Court of first instance was of opinion that the demands required by that law were not fully complied with. It accordingly dismissed the suit. On appeal, the learned District Judge has come to a contrary conclusion and has held that there has been no flaw in the performance of the necessary conditions.

In appeal four points have been urged as showing that the demands were not in accordance with the requirements of the Muhammedan Law.

The first is that the demands were made before the actual registration of the sale-deed in question.

The second is that there was no demand made to the vendee.

The third is that there was no reference to the first and second demands. And the last point is that the invocation of the witnesses was not made in the proper way.

It would be convenient to dispose of the last three points first. It is not suggested that possession of the property had passed to the vendees. It is therefore, obvious that the second demand made to the vendor was quite sufficient. We have had the statements of the witnesses read to us and we are satisfied that there was in the second demand both a reference to the first demand and there was also an invocation of the witnesses. None of these three points therefore haveany force.

With regard to thefirst point it has been strongly contended on behalf of the defendant that inasmuch as under the present law no sale of immoveable property of the value of over Rs. 100 can be completely effected except under a registered deed, the demands were premature as they were made before the sale was perfected by registration.

This contention, however, in view of the pronouncement of the Full Bench in the case of Begam v. Muhammad Yakub (1) is without any force.

In an earlier Full Bench case reported in Janki v. Girjadat (2) it had been held that a right of pre-emption may in certain circumstances arise even in the absence of a registered sale-deed.

In the Full Bench case in 16 All., 344, the learned Chief Justice who delivered the leading judgment in the case at page 347 after pointing out the various conditions required in order to give rise to a right of pre-emption, remarked :—

> "This leads me to the conclusion that what was considered in Muhammedan Law to be a sale upon which a right of pre-emption would arise included an offer unconditional on the part of the vendor and made by him to the purchaser, or intending purchaser, to sell, and accepted by the intending purchaser, although the offer and acceptance were subject to the exercise of an option by the intending purchaser, the exercise of which option was not a necessary condition to the right of pre-emption arising. What apparently was considered as giving a right of pre-emption was either an absolute out-and-out sale, as English lawyers understand the term, or a contract of sale subject to a right of option in the intending purchaser which deprived the intending vendor of any right to refuse to complete the sale, should the intending vendee exercise his option to purchase."

This exposition of the law was accepted by all the other Judges except Banerji, J., who delivered a dissenting judgment. This case, therefore so far as this Court is concerned, is conclusive authority for holding that a right of pre-emption arises not only when an out-and-out sale has been completed but also when a complete contract of sale (without any option in the vendor) has been made.

The learned Advocate for the defendant wanted to invite our attention to rulings of the Calcutta High Court which laid down a contrary proposition of law. On the other hand it was pointed out by the learned Vakil for the respondents that the Bombay High Court has taken not quite the same view. In view of a clear pronouncement by a Full Bench of this Court, which has been followed for so many years, it is unnecessary for us to consider the cases of the other High Courts. That Full Bench case is binding on us.

In view of this interpretation of law it is quite clear that the demands which were made soon after the execution of the sale-deed though before its actual registration were by no means premature and defective.

(1) (1894) 16 All. 344=(1894) A.W.N. 101 (F.B.).
(2) (1885) 7 All. 482=(1885) A.W.N. 97 (F.B.).

The result therefore is that the appeal fails and is hereby dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MEARS, C.J., WALSH AND SULAIMAN, JJ.

In the matter of Babu Dwarka Prasad Mithal, Vakil, Muzaffarnagar.

Civ. Mis. No. 366 of 1923, dated 12th November, 1923.

Legal practitioner—Making serious allegations against Court is liable to be punished.

No practitioner can possibly suggest that because an application that a case should be transferred to the District Judge, had been judicially rejected, there is the slightest ground, in decency or honour, for suggesting that any suspicion has thereby been aroused against the impartiality of the Magistrate. Members of the legal profession are under no duty to their clients to make grave and scandalous charges either against Judges or the opposite parties on the mere wish of their clients. They are agents, not of the man who pays them, but are acting in the administration of justice, and in matters of making applications to Court they are bound to exercise an independent judgment, and to conduct themselves with a sense of personal responsibility. If they fail to act with reasonable care and caution, they are unfit to enjoy the privileges conferred upon them by law, and serious breaches must be visited with punishment. [P. 254, C. 1].

Nehal Chand—for the Vakil.

The Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Mears, C. J.:—In this case Dwarka Prasad Mithal, an LL.B. and a duly qualified member of the legal profession, practising as a pleader in the district of Muzaffarnagar, appears before us to answer to a notice which was issued by a member of this Court, in consequence of a complaint made by the District Magistrate of certain conduct which took place before him. It appears from the admission made by Dwarka Prasad himself before us that he was employed, together with two leaders, Mr. Moore, a Barrister, who was a visitor from Meerut, and Mr. Ramji Lal, a local practitioner of Muzaffarnagar, to represent certain accused in a charge before Mr. Darling, the District Magistrate, in whom Dwarka Prasad has assured us he had complete confidence. Curiously enough, on the first day of the proceedings in the presence of, and with the assent silently given of, Dwarka Prasad, Mr. Moore went out of his way publicly to assure Mr. Darling of the confidence which they all had in him as a tribunal, and assured him there was no reason for desiring to transfer the case. Dwarka Prasad has told us to-day that he has never lost, or had occasion to lose, the confidence which was then publicly expressed upon his behalf. The case proceeded for eight days. The evidence for the prosecution was closed. The statements of the accused had been taken, and his leaders no longer appearing to take part in the case, Dwarka Prasad on the 13th of June made an application to the Magistrate that the case should be committed to Sessions. The merits of that application do not concern us. It was rejected. The result was that the case remained before Mr. Darling for decision.

Dwarka Prasad has told us to-day that because the Magistrate had dismissed that application, he then felt himself entitled to make the disgraceful charge of unfairness against the Magistrate. Whether he did it solely upon his own responsibility, or because he was asked and paid to do it by his clients, appears from his statements to be somewhat difficult to decide satisfactorily. But he has told us that he himself did not consider it, a reasonable application to be made, and no man in his senses could possibly suggest that because an application that the case should be transferred to the District Judge, had been judicially rejected there was the slightest ground, in decency or honour, for suggesting that any suspicion had thereby been aroused against the impartiality of the Magistrate. Nonetheless on the 14th of June, in consequence of the rejection of that application, Dwarka Prasad, reckless apparently of the responsibilities which rest upon legal practitioners representing their clients, put forward an application for an adjournment of the case to enable an application to be made to the High Court for the transfer of the case on the ground that a reasonable suspicion existed against the impartiality of the trying Magistrate. We are satisfied that Dwarka Prasad himself entertained no such view. He had no reasonable suspicion of the impartiality of the Magistrate. He has admitted before us that nothing has occurred to cause him to doubt the confidence which he entertained and which had been expressed on his behalf, in the integrity and impartiality of the Magistrate.

We have invited him and he has confessed himself unable to point to any single fact which justified him in alleging that Mr. Darling was or would be unfair. Having secured an adjournment he took no steps to apply for the transfer. After a delay which has not been explained, and after being soundly advised by a Barrister of this Court that no reasonable application could made to the High Court for transfer, he became a party to a totally different application and abandoned his intention of applying for a transfer. It was not too late then to go to the Magistrate and admit that he had acted improperly, and that no grounds for the application really existed. If he had had a shred of honour or sense of responsibility, it would have been the first thing which he would have done. He was either unwilling, or as he suggested to us, ashamed to do it. The result was that an adjournment having been obtained for the purpose of a transfer, it was deliberately utilised for a totally different purpose. In a half-hearted way Dwarka Prasad, in the course of his answers to the question put by the Court, endeavoured to shift responsibility on to his clients, though he was even unable to remember the particular individual who for this purpose instructed him. This attitude and the painful frequency with which discreditable means are used in the Courts below to obstruct and delay the true course of justice by obtaining adjournments and making futile and childish applications, sometimes offensive applications, to this Court for transfer, renders it necessary that we should make an example of Dwarka Prasad, and that we should issue a serious warning to the members of the profession with the hope that this kind of proceeding will cease. Members of the legal profession are under no duty to their clients to make grave and scandalous charges either against Judges or the opposite parties on the mere wish of their clients. They are not puppets compelled to obey the dictates of their clients where matters of good faith and honourable conduct are concerned. They are responsible to the Court for the fair and honest conduct of a case. They are agents, not of the man who pays them, but are acting in the administration of justice, and in matters of this kind they are bound to exercise an independent judgment, and to conduct themselves with a sense of personal responsibility. If they fail to act with reasonable care and caution they are unfit to enjoy the privileges conferred upon them by law, and serious breaches must be visited with punishment.

We have unfortunately noticed for some time that there is a growing practice in these Provinces to make, if not sometimes statements deliberately untrue to the knowledge of the person making them, at any rate reckless and disgraceful charges of impropriety and partiality against the tribunal when the real ground merely is that the advocate considers himself in danger of losing his case. It is necessary, as a deterrent, to make an example, and to show members of the profession, (be it observed that there are many, indeed the great majority of this profession who will not, and do not, stoop to such practices) that these applications for transfer so made are attended with danger to the persons who make them, when they are proved to be made as recklessly and with such total absence of foundation as the one in this case.

The decision of the Court is that Dwarka Prasad, Pleader of Muzaffarnagar, be suspended from practice for six months from this date.

Pleader suspended for six months.

L. N. Gadodia & Co.—Plaintiffs

v.

G. I. P. Ry. Co., Ltd.—Defendants.

F. A. No. 277 of 1920, dated 21st November, 1923, from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, dated the 24th July, 1920.

Railways Act, S. 72—Consignment at ordinary rate—Railway liable for damage to goods.

Plaintiff tendered to the defendant company 5 bales of cotton tussore to be carried from Sholapore to Cawnpore. The company had an established owner's risk rate from Sholapore to Itarsi, but they had published no such rate between Itarsi and Cawnpore and no consignors of goods between these two latter stations could require the company to carry them at owner's risk. While the goods were proceeding on their journey between Itarsi and Cawnpore, smoke was seen to be issuing from a waggon near the engine and in the result the consignor sustained a pecuniary loss by destruction of and damage to his goods. Held, that the fact that he paid the ordinary rate on the Itarsi-Cawnpore section of the journey entitled him to regard the railway company during this portion of the journey as a bailee. The company was, therefore, bound to show that they took the same degree of care in relation to those goods as a reasonably prudent man would act in relation to his own.

Dr. Katju—for the Appellant.

Zutshi—for the Respondents.

Mears, C. J.:—On the 30th of April, 1919, the plaintiff through his agent tendered to the defendant company 5 bales of cotton tussore to be carried from Sholapore to Cawnpore.

Over some portions of their railway the defendant company carry goods at a reduced or "owners risk" rate. It appears quite clearly that whilst the company had an established owners risk rate from Sholapore to Itarsi, they had published no such rate between Itarsi and Cawnpore and no consignors of goods between these two latter stations could require the company to carry them at owner's risk. The goods would go via Itarsi to Cawnpore. The consignor signed an owner's risk note by which he agreed to hold the company free from responsibility in a number of contingencies. The Subordinate Judge has found that in fact the consignor paid a total sum made up of the reduced rate from Sholapore to Itarsi and of the ordinary rate from Itarsi to Cawnpore. The figures are not mathematically exact but are so near as to justify the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge. When on the 13th of May 1919 the goods were proceeding on their journey between Itarsi and Cawnpore smoke was seen to be issuing from a waggon near the engine. The train was brought to a stand still at station Sanchi and an endeavour made to put out the fire. It was burning fiercely inside the waggon and in the result the consignor sustained a pecuniary loss by destruction of and damage to his goods to the extent of Rs. 5,436-5-6. He made a claim on the company who repudiated it on the ground that they were covered by the owner's risk note signed by his agent which purported to cover the entire journey.

To this the consignor replied that whatever might be the form of the note, the fact was that he paid the ordinary rate on the Itarsi-Cawnpore section of the journey and was therefore entitled to regard the railway company during this portion of the journey as a bailee. We think the plaintiff's contention is clearly right in the admitted absence of an owner's risk rate from Itarsi to Cawnpore.

This is the final result of the arguments in this Court but in the Court below the matter was greatly obscured and the trial lengthened by defective pleadings on both sides and by an inability on the part of the counsel on both sides to forecast the possibility of the company being found to be bailees. Thus it happened that the Counsel for the Railway Company failed to provide himself with the necessary evidence to prove the taking of proper care.

The circumstances under which the fire originated are unknown. The waggon was of iron and was a covered one. It was apparently of proper construction, clean and fit for the accommodation of the goods of the plaintiff. The van contained the plaintiff's goods, also some cases of military stores, some bags of cocoanuts and 12 other boxes. All the goods except those of the plaintiff had come from the Madras and South Mahratta Railway. It is conceded in this case that if the defendants are entitled to rely on the owners risk note as governing the Itarsi-Cawnpore journey, they must succeed in the action as the plaintiff has failed to give any such proof as would overset the wide protection given to the Company by that document. If however the defendants were carrying the goods between Itarsi and Cawnpore at the ordinary rate then the defendants were bound to put before the Court all materials necessary affirmatively to prove that in the carriage of the plaintiff's goods they had acted with the same degree of care in relation to those goods as a reasonably prudent man would act in relation to his own. The burden of proof if the goods were carried at owner's risk lay on the plaintiff. If the company were bailees the onus shifted to them.

Their proper defence should have been first that they were under no liability because of the consignment note. Alternatively if it were held that that note was not applicable that they took of the goods the degree of care described above. That position was however as we have said never clear in the minds of the legal advisers of the railway company in the lower Court and in fact they actually resisted an application made by the plaintiffs on the 14th of July, 1920, which if assented to by them and proper particulars obtained would in our view in all probability have made their position as bailees safe and supplied the gap in their evidence which still exists. On the 14th July, 1920, the plaintiffs were casting about for any evidence which might help them to overcome the provisions of the owner's risk note. On the previous day Pandhari Nath Balwant a witness for the defendants had mentioned the presence of "12 other boxes" in the waggon and had said that he did not know what they contained. No one to this day knows what they contained. It was the plain duty of the railway company, for their own protection, on learning of the fire to have communicated in May, 1919, with the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway company and to have made enquiries as to the description, contents, etc., of these boxes if they had not already, as they may have had, these very materials in their possession. These boxes were part of the contents of a waggon in which a fire had mysteriously broken out on their line and the Company ought to have taken every step to ascertain if they could the nature of the goods entrusted to them. They did not make enquiries at the time. At all events if they did, the result was not communicated to the Court and as we have said they resisted an application which sought to obtain that information from them. Even if immediately after the outbreak of the fire the Company had omitted to enquire from the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway as to the nature of the articles in the 12 boxes, it was the plain duty of their legal advisers, when the Company became defendants in an action, a few months later, to tell them that they would, if unprotected by the risk note, be bound to give an explanation as to the contents of the other articles in the waggon, and then diligently to pursue that enquiry.

Further, they had in their possession at this time, when the action was commenced, some documents which they had received relative to the boxes from the Madras and Southern Maharatta Railway. Although they were highly relevant to the action, the defendants say that they destroyed them in the ordinary course of business.

The Railway Company therefore produced no evidence as to the general nature of the contents of the boxes. It would in our opinion have been sufficient if they had merely proved the consignment or delivery notes of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway, which we are told as a matter of practice pass from one line to another on receipt of goods-provided of course that the details on those notes contained nothing to arouse any suspicion that the goods were likely to be dangerous to carry.

They could then have said that they accepted the boxes in accordance with the usual practice, and that there was nothing on the consignment notes, or in the appearance of the boxes, which would cause any one to hesitate to carry them in the ordinary way, or to place them in proximity to other goods. That evidence would have satisfactorily discharged the onus which lay upon them, as soon as their position was decided to be that of bailees, and would have entitled them to succeed in the action. There being this gap in the evidence as to the 12 boxes we are obliged to hold that the defendants did not produce that quality or amount of evidence which they were bound by law to do in order to prove affirmatively the taking of all due care. Inasmuch however as the plaintiff did not plead his causes of action with precision, and in that he alleged negligence on the part of the Railway Company without giving any particulars of such negligence, and also failed in his pleading and at the trial to bring out the alternative position of Railway Company as bailees, on which point the appeal has succeeded, we whilst reversing the judgment of the lower Court and decreeing the plaintiff's claim, deprive the plaintiff of all costs in the lower Court. The plaintiff will have in this Court the costs of the appeal with fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Lallu Mal—Defendant-Respondent.

F. A. No. 25 of 1921, decided on the 25th June, 1923, from the decree of the Sub-Judge, Meerut.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), S. 118—Recital of cash payment—Plaintiff attempting to prove that part of consideration consisted of reduction of defendant's liability but failing to prove it cannot get a decree on the recital.

In a suit on promissory note which contained a recital that the consideration was paid in cash, the plaintiff abandoned the recital and undertook to prove that the consideration consisted partly of cash and partly of reduction of defendant's liability to a certain firm which was in turn indebted to the plaintiff. He failed to prove the latter part of the case. Held that in respect of the latter part a decree could not be passed in plaintiff's favour merely on the strength of the defendant's signature. [P. 259, C. 2]

Obiter : He could have got a decree for the whole amount if he had offered no evidence at all but relied on the recital.

Judgment :—On the 25th of February, 1920, the defendant Lallu Mal executed in favour of the plaintiff Shambhu Dayal a promissory note for Rs. 8,000. The document begins with the following recital, "I have to-day taken a sum of Rs. 8,000 in cash for payment to Ram Chander Kedar Nath, commission agents of Meerut." On the same date Lallu Mal executed a receipt for the sum of Rs. 8,000, beginning with the words, "I have received to the last farthing the sum of Rs. 8,000 in respect of the note of hand executed by me in favour of Shambhu Dayal. Nothing now remains unpaid out of the amount of the said note of hand." This receipt was attested by two witnesses, Piarey Lal and Timmal Singh, and as it happens each witness has appended to this signature a certain note. Piarey Lal notes that he attested the receipt at the request of Lallu Mal. The ordinary meaning of such a note by an attesting witness would certainly be that he had not seen Lallu Mal with his own eyes execute the receipt, but had attested it at Lallu Mal's request upon an admission by the latter of the genuineness of his signature. Timmal Singh's note is to the effect that Rs. 8,000 were paid over in cash in his presence. The suit when first instituted was dealt with ex parte on the failure of the defendant to enter an appearance. Timmal Singh was examined on the 12th of August, 1920, in the ex parte proceedings as a witness for the plaintiff. He swore to the execution of the promissory note and receipt and stated, "the money was paid in cash in my presence." The defendant subsequently entered an appearance and satisfied the trial Court that he could show sufficient grounds for having the ex parte decree set aside. His next step was to challenge the plaintiff to produce his account books and to take time to inspect the same. In his written statement he finally took the line that, while the promissory note and the receipt had undoubtedly been executed by him, and were in fact entirely in his handwriting, no consideration whatsoever had passed. He explained the matter in this way. He had been gambling in grain with the firm of Ram Chander Kedar Nath, whose names appear in the promissory note. In the month of February 1920, he was anxious to enter into a further transaction with them in respect of 40 grain pits, deliverable three months later. The firm refused to allow him any further opportunity of speculating in grain, unless he was prepared to give some advance payment or security. Having no cash in hand, and being in fact considerably indebted to the firm of Kedar Nath he offered to give them a promissory note. They thought it would not be convenient to take the promissory note either in their own names, or in the names of any member of the firm, and suggested that it might be made out in the name of the plaintiff Shambhu Dayal, who is some sort of a distant relation of Kedar Nath's. On this basis the transaction was entered into, and the two documents in suit were executed. On the case going to trial upon these pleadings, the Court very properly laid the burden of proof on the defendant and Lallu Mal himself gave evidence and was supported by two witnesses, Raghubar Saran and Bharat Singh. Lallu Mal's evidence certainly does not sound straightforward or satisfactory. In particular, when he was examined about certain hundis which he had executed in favour of the firm of Ram Chander Kedar Nath, he was obviously fencing with the Court and keeping back as much of the truth as he could. The important point to be noticed, however, is that he admitted the genuineness of the two hundis executed by him in favour of the firm of Ram Chandar Kedar Nath, which the plaintiff produced as part of his evidence. The witnesses Raghubar Saran and Bharat Singh have been adversely criticised by the trial Court, and, on examining the record of their evidence for ourselves, we can see no reason to reconsider the adverse verdict the trial Court has pronounced upon them. Certainly, if Raghubar Saran is telling the truth, he would have been asked to attest the receipt. If the plaintiff had rested on the case as it stood at the close of the defendant's evidence, it seems impossible to doubt that the trial Court would have decreed the claim on the basis of the double acknowledgment contained in the negotiable instrument itself, which is the basis of the suit, and in the receipt executed on the same date. The plaintiff, however, elected to produce evidence and there is certainly room for controversy about the evidence which he produced. At the outset, the plaintiff departed from the position which he had taken up at the ex parte hearing. Timmal Singh himself had to admit that it was not literally true that Rs. 8,000 in cash had passed from the plaintiff to the defendant on the 26th of February, 1922. The account which he now gives of the transaction may fairly be summarised thus. The plaintiff Shambhu Dayal had been engaged in speculation with the firm Ram Chander Kedar Nath and had been more fortunate than Lallu Mal. There was money due to him on a balance of account from the same firm and it seems that there was also a sum of money due to him on a loan which had been taken from him some years before by Khedar Nath. The total liability of the firm of Ram Chander Kedar Nath to the plaintiff Shambhu Dayal worked out at exactly Rs. 5,000. Now Gopal Chander, son of the plaintiff Shambhu Dayal, who seems to have carried this transaction through on behalf of his father and who was very properly produced as a witness in his father's place, deposes that he came into Meerut with Rs. 3,000 in cash, which he was prepared to advance to Lallu Mal. This advance he did make, and for the remaining Rs. 5,000, necessary to make up total of Rs. 8,000, he turned to the witness Timmal Singh, who is himself a partner in the firm of Ram Chander and Kedar Nath, and said in effect, "now let me have the Rs. 5,000 which the firm owes me and I will hand it over to Lallu Mal to make up the total of Rs. 8,000 for which he has given me a promissory note." According to Gopal Chander it was Lallu Mal himself who replied that this would not be necessary as the firm of Ram Chander Kedar Nath would give him (Lallu Mal) credit for this sum of Rs. 5,000 in reduction of the debt which he owed them. In substance, therefore, the plaintiff's case was this. He advanced Rs. 3,000 in cash and for the rest he took over Lallu Mal as his debtor in a sum of Rs. 5,000, in substitution for the firm of Ram Chander Kedar Nath who had previously owed him the money. The plaintiff supported his story by the production of his account books. These have been adversely criticised by the learned Subordinate Judge upon grounds which seem to us somewhat captious and unreasonable. The entries in these books of account, according to the Christian era, are correct, the day of the week being correctly given in accordance with the corresponding English date. There is a persistent error, extending throughout all the accounts which have been submitted for inspection and covering a period of at least two years, in the correspondence between the Hindi date given according to the Sambat year and the English date. This circumstance, although not particularly creditable to the plaintiff, is not really a valid reason for discrediting the genuiness of the accounts themselves. A very probable explanation of the manner in which such a discrepancy between the Hindi and English dates could come into existence, and continue aggregating itself over a series of years, was suggested to us in argument and seems to us reasonable enough. When we come to the entries for the important date, the 26th of February, 1920, we find that the account purports to show a cash payment of Rs. 8,000, to Lallu Mal on the security of a promissory note partly covered by cash receipts aggregating precisely Rs. 5,000 from the firm Ram Chander Kedar Nath on account of money previously due from the said firm. In substance, the entries agree well enough with the story told by Gopal Chander in the witness-box. They certainly cannot be said to contradict his story.

As for the other point taken by the learned Subordinate Judge, namely, that it is open to argument whether the plaintiff had Rs. 3,000 in cash in hand on the 26th of February, 1920, it does not seem to us that there is anything in it. He started the day with a cash balance of Rs. 2,133-14-6, and by the end of the day he had depleted his cash balance to such an extent that he had only Rs. 207-14-9 in hand. There had been other receipts during the day besides the nominal receipt of Rs. 5,000 from the firm Ram Chander Kedar Nath. Here again there seems no valid basis for the contention that the evidence given by Gopal Chander is contradicted by his accounts. As regards the cash payment of Rs. 3,000 the evidence given is that of Timmal Singh and Piarey Lal. Of course Timmal Singh's evidence is no doubt discounted by the fact that he had taken it upon himself at the ex parte hearing to depose that the entire sum of Rs. 8,000 was paid in cash. At the same time it is reasonable to make some allowance for the manner in which evidence is taken at ex parte proceeding. On the story told by Gopal Chander, if it be assumed even for the sake of argument that that story is in the main true, there was a kind of payment of Rs. 5,000 involved in the transfer of Rs. 5,000 from Ram Chander Kedar Nath to Gopal Chander and back again to Ram Chander Kedar Nath in part satisfaction of the money which Lallu Mal owed. The evidence of Timmal Singh cannot be wholly discredited on the basis of the loose and summary statement made by him in the ex parte proceeding. Moreover, as it seems to us, the trial Court has wholly overlooked the extent to which any evidence produced by the plaintiff regarding the payment of consideration is corroborated by the defendant's signature on the two documents which are the basis of the suit. We are prepared to accept the plaintiff's evidence as proving a cash payment of Rs. 3,000 made to Lallu Mal in connection with the execution of the promissory note. Now as regards the balance of Rs. 5,000 there is some documentary evidence in favour of the plaintiff still to be noticed. On the said date, namely, on the 26th of February, 1920, Ram Chander Kedar Nath executed in favour of Shambhu Dayal and his son Gopal Chander a formal receipt for Rs. 5,000 as received on account of money due from the defendant Lallu Mal. They divided this into two heads, Rs. 2,700 received on account of two hundis executed by Lallu Mal, and Rs. 2,300 credited to Lallu Mal. The hundis Lallu Mal himself admitted were handed over to Gopal Chander in order that he might keep them as evidence of the payment by him and his father of this part of the consideration for the promissory note. Undoubtedly this item of Rs. 2,700 is proved up to the hilt. Our real difficulty is about the item of Rs. 2,300 in any shape or form. The accounts of the firm Ram Chander Kedar Nath were not produced. We may take it as admitted that Lallu Mal was indebted to them on the 26th of February, 1920, to an amount considerably in excess of Rs. 2,300. But what is not proved is that they gave him credit in current account, in reduction of his liability, for this sum of Rs. 2,300. We are bound to hold that this is not proved. The only question then is whether this sum of Rs. 2,300 can be decreed in favour of the plaintiff on the strength of the defendant's signature to the pro-note and the receipts. We have already indicated our opinion that this could have been done if the plaintiff had offered no evidence at all. As the case now stands the plaintiff himself has gone back on the recital in the promissory note to the effect that Rs. 8,000 were paid over in cash. Abandoning that recital, he has undertaken to prove that Lallu Mal got the benefit of Rs. 8,000 partly in cash and partly by reduction of his liabilities towards the firm of Ram Chander Kedar Nath. In our opinion the plaintiff has failed the prove the latter part of his case to the extent of this item of Rs. 2,300, and we must give effect to this finding.

In the result, therefore, we set aside the decree of the trial Court and in lieu thereof we give the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 5,700 with proportionate interest. The parties will pay and receive costs in proportion to failure and success in both Courts. Costs in this Court to include fees on the higher scale. Under the circumstances we decline to allow the plaintiff interest pendente lite or future interest.

Appeal allowed in part.

S. A. No. 320 of 1922, decided on 25th June, 1923, against the decree of the Sessions Judge, Mainpuri, dated 3rd February, 1923.

Civ. Pro. Code, S. 11 and O. 23, r. 1—Appellate Court can pass order under O. 23, r. 1—Fresh suit between the same parties not barred.

Buddhu brought a suit in the Court of the Munsif of Phaphund against the present appellant in which he stated that the property in suit belonged to an idol Sri Thakurji Maharaj Radha Ramji and he was manager on behalf of the said Thakurji and he sued for possession. The suit was dismissed with costs and the plaintiff appealed to the District Judge and along with the appeal presented an application to withdraw the suit and bring a fresh suit. The order of the District Judge on the appeal runs as follows: Ordered that the appeal be allowed and the decree of the Court below be set aside and plaintiff be permitted to withdraw the suit; permission to file a fresh suit.

Held, that an appellate Court has power to pass orders under O. 23, r. 1 (37 A. 326, F B., Foll.) and that the order of the District Judge having set aside the decision of the Munsif that cannot operate as res judicata, (1885 A.W.N. 151 and 9 A.L.J. 378, Ref.) [P. 261, C. 1.]

Judgment:—This appeal raises a somewhat interesting point of law. In 1919, Buddhu brought a suit in the Court of the Munsif of Phaphund in the Mainpuri district against the present appellant in which he stated that the property in suit belonged to an idol Sri Thakurji Maharaj Radha Ramji and he was manager on behalf of the said Thakurji and he sued for possession. Various defences were raised to that suit and it was dismissed by the Munsif in a very short judgment. He held that as the property belonged to the idol the plaintiff could not maintain the suit. Then on the third issue namely whether a Sehdare in dispute belongs to the temple or to the defendant he found as follows:—'The allegation that the Sehdare in dispute belongs to the temple is unsubstantiated. The plaintiff could produce one witness and himself and he refrained from giving any evidence at all. The issue is decided in the negative and the order was that the suit be dismissed with costs." The plaintiff appealed to the District Judge of Mainpuri and along with the appeal presented an application praying that for reason of the formal defect in the pleadings the plaintiff be allowed to withdraw the suit and bring a fresh suit. The order of the District Judge on the appeal runs as follows:—'Ordered that the appeal be allowed and the decree of the Court below be set aside and plaintiff be permitted to withdraw the suit; permission to file a fresh suit.' Thereafter the present suit was filed. Sri Thakurji Maharaj Radha Ramji was described as the plaintiff suing through Buddhu Singh, Manager. The suit was against the same defendant and for the very same reliefs as had been sought in the previous suit. Both Courts have decreed the suit. In second appeal it is urged that the District Judge of Mainpuri had no jurisdiction at all in appeal to pass orders under Order 23, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure or alternatively that he had no jurisdiction under the circumstances to pass the order which he did and therefore his order can be treated as a nullity and disregarded and the original decision of the Munsif in the former case operates as res judicata in this case. That an appellate Court has power to pass orders under Order 23, rule 1, has been decided by a Bench of this Court which is binding on me, in Afzal Begam v. Akbar Khanam (1). Two cases have been cited by the learned Counsel for the appellant to the effect that an order of withdrawal unless it complies strictly with the provisions of Order 23, rule 1 is void and can be treated as a nullity. They are Rama Singh v. Janak Singh (2) and Kali Prasanna Sil v. Panchanan Nandi (3). These two cases are exactly similar but they need not be further considered because the former case, which was a Patna case, was expressly overruled in Raj Kumar Mahton v. Ram Khelawan Singh (4) and the latter in Hridoy Nath Roy v. Ram Chandra Barna Sarma (5). It seems to me that in this case the Judge had jurisdiction to pass the order which he did which was one allowing the appeal. The order allowing the appeal rendered the order of the Munsif dismissing the suit as wholly inoperative and therefore that decision cannot be considered for any purpose. It is dead and gone. The plaintiff had been given leave to bring a fresh suit. This is not perhaps quite accurate because the suit is the same. The only difference is that the mistake made in the former suit, if it was a mistake, was that Buddhu called himself the plaintiff and sued on behalf of the idol claiming though not for himself but for the idol, was corrected and the suit was brought strictly in conformity with the law as laid down by this Court, namely that a suit shall be brought in the name of the idol through its manager. In my opinion the order of the District Judge having set aside the decision of the Munsif, cannot operate as res judicata. I think the cases of Abdul Rahman v. Lal Behari (6) and Chhajju v. Khyali Ram (7) are in point. I therefore dismiss this appeal with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Satdhar—Appellant

v.

Ram Chandra and another—Respondents.

Civ. Rev. No. 71 of 1923, decided on 30th October, 1923, from the order of Judge of Small Cause Court, Allahabad, dated 23rd December, 1921.

Execution sale—Sale of property not saleable under special law, is void.

It is the duty of the execution Court to see whether it has jurisdiction to sell a certain property and therefore where a sale is prohibited by law, e.g., in this case by the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act (II of 1903), the execution Court cannot proceed with the sale even though there is a decree for its sale. In such a case no question of estoppel against the defendant really arises. If, therefore, a sale did take place under such a decree it was a mere nullity and could in no sense pass title to the purchasers. (18 A.L.J. 59, Foll.). [P. 262, C. 1, and P. 263, C. 1.]

B. N. Vyas—for Appellant.

J. B. Lal and S. P. Sinha—for Respondents.

Judgment:—The decree-holders respondents obtained a decree from the Court of Small Causes on the 20th of November, 1918, against the applicant Satdhar. In execution of that decree they attached a grove situated in Bundelkhand. One Md. Yasin on the strength of a sale-deed from the judgment-debtor raised certain objections that the property did not belong to the judgment-debtor. His objections were allowed. The decree-holders then instituted a regular suit for a declaration that the sale-deed in favour of Md. Yasin was fictitious and that the property belonged to their judgment-debtor and was liable to attachment and sale in execution of their decree. In this suit Satdhar was also impleaded but apparently did not put in an appearance. This suit was decreed on the 16th February, 1920, and an appeal from that decree was also ultimately dismissed. The decree-holders had a declaration against Md. Yasin and Satdhar that the property belonged to Satdhar and was liable to attachment and sale in execution of their decree.

After Md. Yasin had been got rid of, Satdhar put in a new set of objections on the 4th of November, 1920, urging that the property was governed by the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act (II of 1903). On the date fixed for hearing Satdhar did not appear and his objections were dismissed for default on the 4th November, 1920. On the 22nd January, 1921, he put in an application for restoration of his objections but that application was dismissed on the same date. After this on the 27th of January, 1921, the grove was sold and purchased by the decree-holders themselves and on the 1st of March, 1921, this sale was actually confirmed. It does not appear that Satdhar put in any formal application for setting aside the sale dated the 22nd of January 1921. He, however, on the 9th of March, 1921, appealed from the order dismissing his application for restoration. His appeal was allowed on the 29th March, 1921, and the case was remanded. The result of all these proceedings was that the objections which Satdhar had filed on the 4th September, 1920, were revived and had to be disposed of on the merits.

On the 5th July, 1921, the Court of first instance allowed his objections and, holding that the property being covered by the Bundelkhand Land Alienation Act was not liable to be sold, set aside the sale. The decree-holders appealed from this order and the lower appellate Court by an order dated the 23rd December, 1921, agreed with the finding of the first Court that the grove was not saleable in execution of the decree. The learned Judge thought that that part of the Munsiff's order which had directed the setting aside of the sale was "unnecessary."

The judgment-debtor has come up in revision and wants to have the modification made by the lower appellate Court corrected.

On the findings of the Court below there can be no doubt whatsoever that the land in question is one which comes within Act II of 1903. The finding of the lower appellate Court is that the spaces lying between the trees growing on this land are used as pasture land and are sometimes actually cultivated for raising crops or fodder. The land is not occupied by any building and is used for purposes subservient to agriculture. It is admittedly situated in Bundelkhand. It is clear, therefore, that it falls within the meaning of the definition of land as given in section 2 (2) of Act II of 1903. This finding of the lower appellate Court has not in any way been challenged on behalf of the respondents.

I have to consider two main points in this revision.

1. The effect of the declaratory decree, dated the 16th February, 1920.

2. The effect of the order confirming the sale, dated the 1st March, 1921.

On behalf of the respondents it is strongly contended that in face of the declaratory decree obtained against Satdhar it is no longer open to Satdhar to say that the land is such as is not liable to be sold. It is contended that the former decree declaring that the land is liable to be sold in execution of the decree in question is final and estops the judgment-debtor from raising any objection to the same. This contention, however, has no force. The point has been the subject of previous decisions and is covered by clear authorities. In the case of Hanuman Prasad Narain Singh v. Harak (1) a Division Bench of this Court laid down that even where a mortgage decree for the sale of land situated in Bundelkhand had been obtained, it was open to the judgment-debtor to raise the objection that the land being not saleable could not be sold. The ratio decidendi of that case was that it is the duty of the execution Court to see whether it has jurisdiction to sell it and that therefore where a sale is prohibited by law the execution Court cannot proceed with the sale even though there is a decree for its sale. It was held that in such a case no question of estoppel against the defendant really arises. There is also the Full Bench case, viz., that of Katwari v. Sita Ram Tewar (2) which is analogous. A mortgage decree for sale of occupancy holding had been obtained against the tenant, and yet the Full Bench allowed the judgment-debtor to raise the plea in the Execution Department that the property was not saleable in view of the provisions of section 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act (No. II of 1901).

The Full Bench has clearly laid down the rule that where the Court has no jurisdiction to sell some property it is immaterial whether a decree for sale of that land has been previously obtained and is in execution. I am therefore, of opinion that the decree-holders cannot take advantage of the effect of the declaratory decree of the 16th February, 1920. I may further point out that that decree was in substance a decree against Md. Yasin, and Satdhar was a mere pro forma defendant. Apart from that the decree-holders themselves did not raise this plea in the Courts below as there is no reference to any such plea in either of the judgments.

The next point is whether the subsequent confirmation of the sale of the 1st March, 1921, has any effect on these objections. I am of opinion that that confirmation cannot have any adverse effect. In the first place the effect of the remand by the lower appellate Court was to revive the objections of the 4th of September, 1920. The judgment-debtor is entitled to have his objections heard on the merits as they stood on that date. No sale had taken place till then. It is clear therefore, that in view of the findings of the Courts below that the land was not saleable, the execution Court had no jurisdiction whatsoever to sell it. The objections of Satdhar to that effect were well founded and should have been allowed. I therefore, accept the finding of the lower appellate Court that the grove in question was not at all saleable in execution of the respondent's decree, and that the execution Court had no jurisdiction whatsoever to sell it. If, therefore, any sale did take place it was a mere nullity and could in no sense pass title to the decree-holders as purchasers.

(1) (1920) 42 All. 142=18 A.L.J. 59=14 U.P.L.R. (All.) 192=58 I.C. 551.
(2) (1921) 43 All. 547=19 A.L.J. 473=63 I.C. 264.

On behalf of the respondents it is contended that this Court should not express any opinion as to whether the sale of the 27th January, 1921, is liable to be set aside or not. I do not propose to leave things in any confusion. I have already held that the Court had no jurisdiction to sell the property and that the sale was a nullity. When the sale itself is void, and not voidable, no question of its being liable to be set aside really arises. In the case of Khiali Ram v. Zahur Ali Khan (3), the interest of Z was attached in execution of a decree and Z objected to the sale on the ground that it was his ex-proprietary tenancy. His objection was overruled and the property was sold and purchased by another person. In the meantime Z preferred an appeal which was decreed and the land was declared to be his ex-proprietary tenancy. It was held that the land not having been liable to sale, the sale was a nullity and the purchaser took nothing by his purchase. I may also point out that in the case of Hanuman Prasad Narain Singh v. Harakh Narain (1) the lower appellate Court had actually in reversing the decree of the first Court set aside the sale and that order was upheld by the High Court. I adopt the form which the final order on appeal in this Court took in that case and I hold that the objection raised with regard to the property not being saleable was a valid objection and the property was not liable to sale in execution of the decree. As the order for sale was an invalid and an illegal order, the sale which has taken place in pursuance of that order must fall to the ground and must be deemed to be a nullity. The judgment-debtor absented himself and allowed his objection to be dismissed for default, and then did not put in any formal application requesting the Court not to confirm the sale when he ultimately appealed to the Judge after the confirmation. But for these omissions the case might not possibly have been protracted. For the above reasons I direct that the parties should bear their costs of this application. Holding that the subsequent sale is a nullity I uphold the order directing the release of the attachment.

Application dismissed.

Judgment:—In this case a preliminary objection has been taken to the hearing of the appeal that no second appeal is maintainable. The suit was one of a Small Cause Court nature below Rs. 500 in value and as held in Harakh v. Ram Sarup (1) and Narayan Parmanand v. Nagindas Bhaidas (2) no second appeal lies against an order of execution of a decree in a suit of that kind. The petition of appeal can, however, be treated as a petition in revision. Let the petition be therefore removed from the register of second appeals and registered as a petition in revision and dealt with as such.

On the 11th of November, 1918 a decree for money was obtained by the decree-holder applicant against Mt. Rajwanti as a legal representative of her husband Mahip Shukul in accordance with a compromise which provided that the money should be repayable without interest within six months and that if no such payment was made the decree-holder should be entitled to recover his money with interest at Re. 1 per mensem from the date of the decree. The terms of the compromise were embodied in the decree.

According to the above decree the money fell due on the 11th of May, 1919. An application for execution was made by the decree-holder on the 7th of November, 1921, against the estate of Mahip Shukul in the hands of Ram Sumer who was described as having obtained possession of the property of the deceased on the death of Mt. Rajwanti as his reversionary heir. Ram Sumer denied that he was in possession of any property of Mahip Shukul or that he was his reversionary heir. He pointed out that Mt. Rajwanti had an adopted son named Ram Anjore and that the decree-holder should obtain execution against him. Ram Anjore appeared and stated that he had been adopted by Mahip Shukul. The name of Ram Anjore was therefore substituted in place of Ram Sumer in the application for execution.

Ram Anjore thereupon filed an objection, stating inter alia that he was not bound by the decree, as he had been adopted by Mahip Shukul and had not been made a party to the suit and that the decree was in any case barred by limitation against him. That objection was dismissed for default. The Court in which the execution proceeding was pending, however, proceeded to determine the question of limitation and came to the conclusion that the decree was barred by time, because the substitution of the name of Ram Anjore was made after the expiry of more than three years from the date of the decree. On appeal that order was upheld. Both the Courts below omitted to notice that the decree was not capable of execution till the 11th of May, 1919, that is, till after the expiry of six months from the date of the decree, because the judgment-debtor had been allowed the option of paying the decretal money within that period without interest. No payment was, however, made and as held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rameshvar Singh v. Homeshvar Singh (3), article 181 is applicable to such a case, under which the period of limitation is three years from the time when the right to apply accrues. Their Lordships pointed out that when the Limitation Act of 1908 prescribed three years from the date of a decree or order as a period within which it must be enforced, the language read with its context referred only to an order or decree made in such a form as to render it capable in the circumstances of being enforced. In Aiyasamier v. Venkatachela Mudali (4) the date of the decree in clause (a) of section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure was similary interpreted as meaning the date when the decree became executable. The decree in the present case did not become capable of execution till a default had been made by the judgment-debtor to pay the decretal money within the period allowed; and whether article 181 or article 182, clause (7) of the Indian Limitation Act (No. IX of 1908) was applied, the time from which the period of limitation began to run would not be deemed to have commenced till after the expiry of that period. The amount to which the decree-holder was entitled became then determinable and recoverable.

It is contended on behalf of the judgment-debtor that article 181 does not apply to cases covered by section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that article 182 clause (7) similarly does not apply where no certain date is fixed for the payment of the decretal money. But section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure deals with the maximum limit of time provided for execution and does not prescribe the period within which each application for execution is to be made. The right to apply for execution accrues under it from the date when the default in making the payment occurs; and there is nothing in that section governing the provisions applicable to periodical applications for the execution of a decree which can be made after the right to apply for execution has accrued, so long as the decree subsists and is capable of execution. A date capable of being made certain by the computation of the time provided for payment is as certain for the purpose of article 182 of the Indian Limitation Act as a specific date entered in or provided for by a decree or order. The decision in Yusuf Khan v. Sirdar Khan (5), to which a reference has been made during the hearing, has been considered in Kaveri v. Venkamma (6) and Lakshimibai Bapuji Oka v. Madhavrav Bapuji Oka (7). Whatever might be said as regards a decree, directing the payment of an annuity, no such consideration would arise, where a specific period is fixed for the payment of the money and the right to apply for execution is postponed till default is made in payment within that period.

A reference has also been made to the decision in Lalta Prasad v. Sheo Sahai (8) but in that case the decree, though purporting to have been passed in accordance with the terms of a compromise, did not specify the limit of time within which the decretal money was to be paid.

In any case the substitution of the name of Ram Anjore in the original application for execution of the 7th of November, 1921, had the effect of validating the application for execution made against the estate of Mahip Shukul, though a legal representative who was not in possession of that property was wrongly entered as having been in possession thereof.

The lower appellate Court has referred to the decision in Gyanendra Nath Basu v. Nihalo Bibi (9) but in that case the second application was made for execution against certain property against the legal representative after the previous application for execution against other property had been dismissed against persons who were not really the legal representatives of the deceased judgment-debtor. The decree in the present case was passed against the estate of Mahip Shukul and it was against that estate that the present application for execution was made, though the legal representative was wrongly described as Ram Sumer instead of Ram Anjore who was eventually substituted in the place of the former.

It is also urged that an erroneous decision on the question of limitation cannot be challenged in an application for revision under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but whether section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure or section 107 of the Government of India Act is applied, the decision of the Court below, which ignores that the decree, as it was originally passed was not capable of execution till the expiry of six months from the date of the decree, is so palpably erroneous as to amount almost to an improper refusal to exercise the jurisdiction, which was vested in the Court to execute the decree, to the prejudice of the party entitled to execute the same.

The application, is therefore, allowed and the execution case remanded to the Court of first instance with a direction to reinstate it under its original number and to proceed to dispose of it in the manner provided by the law. The costs here and hitherto will abide the result.

Revision allowed.

STUART AND KANHAIYA LAL, JJ.

Sat Narain—Applicant

v.

Sarju—Opposite party.

Cr. Mis. Nos. 168-170 of 1923, decided on the 21st November, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 526—Letters Patent (Allahabad), S. 22—High Court cannot transfer Criminal Proceedings pending before village panchayat.

A village panchayat constituted under the Local Act VI of 1920 is not a "Criminal Court" within the meaning of Chapter II of the amended Crim. Pro. Code; therefore, S. 526 would have no application. So also S. 22 of the Letters Patent (Allahabad) does not apply and the High Court has no jurisdiction to direct the transfer of a case from a panchayat constituted under the Local Act.

Per Kanhaiya Lal, J. :—A village panchayat is a Court for the purpose of section 22 of the Letters Patent, and in the absence of any limitation imposed by any Act, the High Court has power under that section to transfer any criminal proceeding pending before a village panchayat to another village panchayat empowered to take cognizance thereof. [P. 267, C. 2.]

S. D. Sinha—for the Applicant.

The Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Stuart, J. :—These are three applications by which the High Court is asked to transfer cases pending before a panchayat constituted under Local Act VI of 1920 from the panchayat seized with hearing the cases to some other Court or panchayat competent to entertain the same. The applicants applied to the "Collector" that is to say, to the Sub-Divisional Officer exercising the powers of a Collector under section 74. He refused to interfere in the matter on the ground of the vagueness of their allegations. In respect of the merits of the matter both my learned brother and myself are satisfied that there is no reason for interfering and these applications will be dismissed on the facts. But inasmuch as in the order of reference by which the matter came before us certain points have been raised as to our jurisdiction I consider it advisable to express my own opinion on the competence of the High Court to entertain such applications. It appears to me clear that a village panchayat constituted under the provisions of Local Act VI of 1920 is not a "Criminal Court" within the meaning of Chapter II of the amended Code of Criminal Procedure and as it is not a Criminal Court within the meaning of that Act section 526 would have no application. It has, however, been pressed upon us that this Court would have power to transfer under the provisions of section 22 of the Letters Patent of this Court. Section 22 of the Letters Patent is as follows :—

"We do further ordain that the said Court shall have power to direct the transfer of a criminal case or appeal from any Court to any other Court of equal or superior jurisdiction."

Village panchayats are in no way subordinate to the authority of the High Court. The High Court cannot in any way interfere either in appeal or revision with their decisions. The only authority which can interfere with their decisions is the Collector or the officer to whom the Collector's power are delegated under the provisions of the Local Act. These officers are Revenue Officers. It appears to me impossible to read the words in section 22 of the Letters Patent "From any Court to any other Court of equal or superior jurisdiction" to mean more than "From any Court subordinate to the High Court's authority to any other Court of equal or superior jurisdiction subordinate to the High Court's authority." If a Court is not subordinate to the High Court's authority how can the High Court make its order effective? As far as I can see if this Court ordered a panchayat to transfer a case to another panchayat and either panchayat refused to obey the High Court's order, the High Court would have no method of enforcing its order, and for this reason alone I cannot see that section 22 can have any application. I therefore give it as my view that this Court has no jurisdiction to direct the transfer of a case from a panchayat constituted under the provisions of Local Act Act VI of 1920.

Kanhaiya Lal, J. :—The question for consideration in these cases is whether this Court is competent under section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure or section 22 of the Letters Patent to transfer a criminal proceeding pending before a village panchayat to another village panchayat.

The village panchayats were established under the United Provinces Act VI of 1920. As the preamble to that Act shows they were constituted to assist in the administration of civil and criminal justice, and special jurisdiction was conferred on them to try and dispose of certain civil suits and certain classes of criminal cases. Section 43 of the Act provides that in discharging this duty the panchayat shall be bound by no laws of evidence and procedure other than the procedure prescribed under that Act. Section 52 declares that except as provided by section 71 no order or decree of a panchayat shall be called in question in any Court on the ground that it was passed without jurisdiction. By section 71 the Collector is given authority

(a) to cancel the jurisdiction of a panchayat with respect to any proceeding or case or,

(b) to quash any proceedings of a panchayat at any stage, or

(c) to cancel any order or decree passed by it.

Section 53 lays down that except the Collector, no Court or authority shall have power to revise any decree or order passed by a panchayat in a suit. There is no such provision in regard to a criminal proceeding pending before a village panchayat. But section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is limited in its application to criminal proceedings pending before a criminal Court subordinate to the High Court. This Court has not been given any authority either by the Village Panchayat Act or by the Code of Criminal Procedure to exercise any authority over the Courts constituted under Act VI of 1920. It can call for no returns from those panchayats or issue any directions as to the manner in which they are to discharge their duties.

There is no such limitation however in section 22 of the Letters Patent. Section 20 defines the authority of the High Court as a Court of appeal over the criminal Courts subordinate to it, and section 21 similarly describes the authority of the High Court as a Court of reference and revision over the criminal Courts subordinate to its appellate jurisdiction. But section 22 gives wider powers and authorises the High Court to transfer any criminal case or appeal from any Court to any other Court of equal or superior jurisdiction and also to direct the preliminary investigation or trial of any criminal case by any officer or Court otherwise competent to investigate or try, though such case may belong in the ordinary course to the jurisdiction of any other officer or Court. Such an officer or Court may or may not ordinarily be subordinate to its appellate authority, but for purposes of transfer would be subordinate. The word "Court" is not defined in the U. P. General Clauses Act or in the Code of Criminal Procedure or the Village Panchayat Act, and as pointed out in Queen-Empress v. Ram Lal (1), "it must in the absence of any definition be taken in its ordinary sense". According to Strouds' Judicial Dictionary, the word "Court" ordinarily means a place where justice is judicially administered. The preamble to the Village Panchayat Act shows that the village panchayats were constituted for the purpose of assisting in the administration of civil and criminal justice. The village panchayat must therefore be deemed to be a Court for the purpose of section 22 of the Letters Patent, and I am inclined to think that in the absence of any limitation imposed by any Act, the High Court has power under that section to transfer any criminal proceeding pending before a village panchayat to another village panchayat empowered to take cognizance thereof. I concur however with my learned brother in thinking that no sufficient reason for a transfer has been made out and I agree in rejecting these applications.

By the Court:—The applications are rejected.

Emperor

v.

Chater Singh.

Govt. Crl. A. No. 853 of 1923, dated 31st October, 1923, against the order of Sessions Judge of Bulandshahr, dated the 14th July, 1923.

Excise Act, S. 3 (2)—Sub-Inspector of Police invested with powers under S. 10, is an excise officer within the Act.

Where a Sub-Inspector as a police officer had been invested with powers under that section, held that this was sufficient to constitute him an Excise Officer within the meaning of the definition, wherever the words "Excise Officer" occurred in the Act. It is unnecessary in such a case for the Local Government to issue a further notification authorising persons on whom it had already conferred powers for the purposes of the Act to do something which the Act says any "Excise Officer" may do. [P. 269, C. 1.]

Govt. Advocate—for Emperor.

Shabd Saran—for Chater Singh.

Piggott, J.:—This is an appeal by the Local Government, presenting some peculiar features. The case itself was a simple one. Sub-Inspector Mohan Lal, officer in charge of Aurangabad police station, received information that Chitar Singh, a petty shop-keeper of a village called Saidpura, was selling liquor at his shop, which he kept ostensibly for the sale of groceries. Chitar Singh had no license for the sale of intoxicating liquor. The Sub-Inspector raided the shop. He says, and he is corroborated by at any rate two witnesses, that Chitar Singh was sitting outside his shop as the police officer and those with him approached, and that he thereupon ran away. The shop being searched, there were found inside seven bottles of country spirit and a barrel of the same, together with a vessel used for filling bottles from the barrel. The expert evidence of Babu Girwar Singh, Excise Inspector, shows that the liquor was of abnormal strength, being more powerful than what is permitted to be issued from Government distilleries. The accused was not found for some days. He was eventually arrested and the Magistrate took cognizance of the case on the report submitted to him by the Sub-Inspector.

The accused's defence was that the shop was raided in his absence, at the instigation of some enemy of his, and that the same enemy must have planted the liquor in the shop.

In view of the quantity found, this is a very improbable suggestion. We have examined the evidence in detail and we do not think there is any force in the accused's defence. Such evidence as he called in his defence was fragmentary and contradictory. We are satisfied that on the facts the Magistrate was justified in convicting Chitar Singh, as he did, of an offence punishable under section 60 clause (a) of the Excise Act. He did not think it necessary to record an opinion whether the accused had also been guilty of a further offence, that, of selling country spirit, punishable under section 60, clause (1).

Chitar Singh appealed to the Sessions Judge. His memorandum of appeal challenges the decision of the trial Court on all questions of fact. It suggests that the conduct of the police in making the search was irregular. There is a plea that the Sub-Inspector ought to have reported the matter to the Magistrate more promptly than he did. But apart from a general plea that the conviction is contrary to law, there is no suggestion in the petition of appeal that the trying Magistrate had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the offence on the report of the Sub-Inspector. Before the learned Sessions Judge however this plea was orally taken, and he allowed it to be argued without insisting on any amendment of the memorandum of appeal. Chitar Singh was accordingly acquitted upon the mere finding that by reason of the provisions of section 7 (1) (a) of the Excise Act, the Magistrate had acted without jurisdiction, in that he took cognizance of the offence, not having before him the complaint or report of any Excise Officer.

If the learned Sessions Judge had insisted on this plea being formally taken in writing, it is probable that the Government Pleader would have found an answer to it, and much trouble and expenditure of judicial time would have been saved. Curiously enough however the Local Government in filing this appeal have duplicated the very same mistake. The appeal comes before us on a general plea, that the order of acquittal is against the weight of evidence on the record. We have refused to entertain the appeal on that ground, which obviously is not an arguable one but we have permitted the learned Government Advocate, who is himself not responsible for the drafting of the Government's memorandum of appeal to amend the same by adding a further plea. This is to the effect that, in view of a Government order of the 13th of July, 1910, the Sub-Inspector, being a police officer invested with certain powers under the authority exercisable by the Local Government by virtue of section 10 of the Excise Act, he was by definition an "Excise Officer", and therefore a person competent to make a complaint or report to a Magistrate under section 7 (1) (a) already referred to. The appeal has been argued on this basis, and counsel has been engaged to represent the accused Chitar Singh, who has also appeared in person.

There can be no doubt that under section 10 of the Excise Act the Local Government had authority to empower, not only a Sub-Inspector of Police, but any police officer to perform duties and exercise powers under that Act, including the conferment of authority to make a report or complaint. Now the Local Government has in express terms authorised any police officer to arrest and to make searches in connection with a number of offences including the offence of being in illicit possession of intoxicating liquor of which Chitar Singh has been convicted. It would certainly be anomalous if the Sub-Inspector had authority to arrest Chitar Singh and to search his shop, and was moreover required by law to produce Chitar Singh before a competent Magistrate within 24 hours of his arrest but could not by reporting the facts to the Magistrate give that Magistrate authority to take cognizance of the alleged offence.

We think that this anomaly has been avoided by the very wide definition of the words "Excise Officer" contained in sub-clause 2 of section 3 of the Excise Act. According to that definition an "Excise Officer" means not merely a Collector, or other officer appointed as such, but also an officer or person invested with powers under the Act by a Government order lawfully issued under the provisions of section 10. The Sub-Inspector as a police officer has been invested with powers under that section. This is sufficient to constitute an Excise Officer within the meaning of the definition, wherever the words "Excise Officer" occur in the Act. It was, therefore, unnecessary, and would have complicated matters, for the Local Government to issue a further notification authorising persons on whom it had already conferred powers for the purposes of the Act to do something which the Act says any "Excise Officer" may do. The learned Sessions Judge therefore was mistaken in the ground on which he has acquitted Chitar Singh.

We set aside his order of acquittal, and in lieu thereof we restore the conviction recorded by the trying Magistrate. We have given careful attention to the question of sentence. In view of all the circumstances and of the amount and strength of the liquor seized, we do not think the trying Magistrate was in error in imposing the sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment. We restore that sentence, with effect from the date on which it was passed, that is to say, any period of imprisonment already served by Chitar Singh since the date of his original conviction will be reckoned towards the period of imprisonment which he has been ordered to serve. The accused will be taken into custody and arrangements made for conveying him to the Bulandshahr district to serve out his sentence.

Appeal allowed.

Ghariba and others—Applicants

v.

King-Emperor—Opposite Party.

Cr. Ref. No. 583 of 1923, decided on the 29th October, 1923, reference made by the Sessions Judge, Jhansi, dated 2nd October, 1923.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 107—Order without evidence but on the admission of accused, is good.

Certain persons were called upon to furnish security. They appeared and expressed their willingness to be bound over. The trial Court therefore took no evidence and passed an order against them. Held, that the consent of accused amounted to a plea of guilty and the order was right. (54 I. C. 784, Not Foll; 37 All. 30 and 54 I. C. 411, Dist; 34 Cal. 674, Dissented). [P. 270, C. 1.]

The parties were not represented.

FACTS.—Two sets of persons were called on to furnish security to keep the peace. They appeared before the Magistrate and consented to execute the bonds. Then the order complained of was made without the taking of evidence.

Judgment:—I am not prepared to interfere in this case. It must be assumed that the Magistrate had some evidence of the likelihood of a breach of the peace being committed by these men before he issued notice. I am inclined to think that I went too far by saying in Jagdat Tewari v. Emperor (1), that there must be some evidence upon the record beyond a full consent to be bound over, given by the person summoned. I find that each of these persons had the notice read out to him and in answer to the notice expressed his willingness to execute a bond for Rs. 100 to keep the peace. This is in itself evidence on which a Magistrate can act. It is really a plea of guilty, assuming the person summoned understands what he is doing. A man may waive the formal production of evidence against himself. By doing so he saves himself and the Court unnecessary trouble, and he may well consider in the case of a notice, the reason for which he doubtless understands perfectly well, that the evidence against him is sufficient to justify his consenting to an order. I see that in the notice of appeal to the Sessions Judge the objection was taken, no doubt by the lawyer, that the appellants expressed no willingness to execute the bonds, and even if they did so the Court could not make an order under the law in the absence of any evidence. I am afraid that it too often happens that a trick is played upon the Court, which is induced to make an order by consent, so as to avoid the production of formal evidence, and in order to found an argument for the Court of appeal. I think a Court under section 107 is perfectly entitled to act upon a solemn consent given before it by the accused person as was done in these cases. I can quite understand the Sessions Judge taking the view that he did upon the authorities, but on reconsideration I think I went too far in the case cited above. The case decided by Mr Justice Piggott, Emperor v. Mul Chand (2) was very different. There was no inquiry at all. I do not agree with the decision in Ram Chandra v. Emperor (3). In the case before Mr. Justice Ryves, Chander Shekhar v. Emperor (4) also there was no inquiry. I still think that it would be better for a Magistrate to take formal evidence, and to have an admission on the record, but I do not agree with the view which I formerly took that a consent may not amount to an admission. In any event I should not have done as I did in that case, and sent the case back, but I have to come the conclusion that this is superflous where after due inquiry and notice, a free consent amounting to a plea of guilty, has been given. I may add that I have consulted Mr. Justice Ryves, and another Judge of this Court, and both agree with the view I have taken here. Let the record be returned.

Conviction upheld.

S.A. No. 455 of 1921, decided on 8th February, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Azamgarh, dated 22nd December, 1920.

(a) Civ. Pro. Code, S. 11—Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), S. 198—Suit by landlord for rent—Payment to third person pleaded—Third person made party—Decision against third party does not bar civil suit by third party.

Where in a suit by the landlord for arrears of rent the tenant pleads payment in good faith to a third person who is therefore made a party to the suit and the suit is decided against him, Held that such a decision does not preclude the latter from establishing his title in a Civil Court, as the previous suit does not come within the purview of those rulings of this Court which hold that a suit will not lie in a Civil Court if its object is to avoid a decision arrived at by a Revenue Court in a matter in which it had exclusive jurisdiction.

(b) Civ. Pro. Code, S. 100—Finding of fact based on mistake of fact is not binding.

A finding entirely based on a mistake of fact is not a finding which can bind the High Court. [P. 271, C. 1.]

Judgment:—The facts out of which this appeal arises are as follows:—Fida Husain Khan, Madar Baksh and Muhammad Ali were co-sharers of the village in suit. Madar Baksh and Muhammad Ali sold their shares to Mt. Saidunnissa, who was the predecessor-in-title of Habib Khan, defendant No. 1. They became ex-proprietary tenants of their sir. They relinquished their rights, and Bangur, defendant No. 2, became non-occupancy tenant of the plots in suit. In proceedings under section 36 of the Land Revenue Act it was decided that certain plots, including the plots in suit, were in the exclusive possession of Mt. Saidunnissa Bibi, under a partition of sir land in those proceedings. Subsequently, Habib Khan sued Bangur for the whole of the rent of the two plots in suit. Bangur pleaded that he had paid the rent in good faith to Fida Husain. Fida Husain thereupon was made a party to the suit and the suit was ultimately decreed by the appellate Court, which decided against Fida Husain. Thereupon Fida Husain brought this suit for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant No. 1 from realising more than his share of the rent from the defendant No. 2. Both the lower Courts have decreed the claim. The defendant Habib Khan comes here in second appeal and three grounds have been pressed on his behalf: (1) that the suit is barred by the provisions of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure: (2) that the suit is not cognisable by the Civil Courts, and (3) that on a true construction of Ex. A, it is clear that the land in suit is the exclusive property of the defendant-appellant. The first and the second pleas have no force having regard to section 198 (2) of the Tenancy Act. This suit does not come within the purview of those rulings of this Court which have held that a suit will not lie in a Civil Court if its object is to avoid a decision arrived at by a Revenue Court in a matter in which it had exclusive jurisdiction. There remains the third point.

It appears that in the proceedings under section 36 of the Land Revenue Act, to which we have referred, a petition was put in by Mubammad Ali Khan and Madar Baksh to the effect that the sir land had been partitioned privately between the co-sharers and Mt. Saidunnissa and that she had been given exclusive possession of certain plots as appertaining to her share, and details were given of the plots which were said to have been allotted to the exclusive possession of Mt. Saidunnissa and also of the plots which had been allotted to the other co-sharers. We find that the two plots in suit were there entered as having been allotted exclusively to Mt. Saidunnissa. The learned Subordinate Judge in the Court below dealing with the question of possession has come to what would appear to be a finding of fact, namely, that the appellant, that is to say, Habib Khan, was not in exclusive possession of the plots in suit. We find that this finding is entirely based on a mistake of fact and, therefore, it is not a finding which can bind us in second appeal. There was no oral evidence in the case. The defendant relied on Ex. A, which was the application already referred to, filed by Madar Baksh and Muhammad Ali in the proceedings under section 36 of the Land Revenue Act. Those proceedings ultimately ended in an order in terms of the application. To those proceedings Fida Husain was a party, and this is the mistake of fact which has vitiated the whole of the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge. He says that Ex. A proves nothing, because the present plaintiff, Fida Husain Khan, was no party to it, and this was the reason which he gives for holding that Habib Khan was not in exclusive possession of the plots in suit. Of course, Fida Husain was no party to the application, but he was a party to the proceedings which ended in an order against him in terms of the application. There being no legal finding on the question of possession under section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we propose to examine the evidence which is entirely documentary to decide the point. We find that the rent suit, to avoid which this suit was brought, was rightly decided on the ground that the sir land had been partitioned between the co-sharers, and Mt. Saidunnisa was given particular plots of sir land for her exclusive possession and enjoyment, and, as Habib Khan represents her now, he must be held to be in possession of those particular plots of sir land and entitled to their rent, whether he cultivates them himself or lets them out to tenants is quite immaterial. It is not a fact, as the learned Munsif seemed to think, that the plots could not be in his exclusive enjoyment if they were actually cultivated by a tenant. In this view of the case the decision in Debi Pershad v. Bhagwan Din (1) has no application, as the facts are different. In our view the decisions of both the Courts below must be reversed and the suit dismissed. We, therefore, allow this appeal, set aside the decrees of both the Courts below and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs in all Courts.

S.A. No. 1499 of 1921, decided on 28th March, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Jaunpore, dated 14th July 1921.

Pleadings—Alternative prayer cannot be converted into an additional prayer.

In the village in suit there was some waste land appertaining to a shamilat pitti in which there were twenty or more co-sharers. One of these determined to bring a number of plots of this waste land under cultivation; but instead of occupying them himself he granted a perpetual lease of the same to two lessees. About a year later the lessees induced seven more of the co-sharers in the patti to grant them another perpetual lease. The present suit was brought by two co-sharers who were dissatisfied with this arrangement. The principal relief sought was a declaration that the two leases above referred to "are improper, null and void and are not fit to be enforced." There was an alternative prayer for a decree for joint possession in favour of the plaintiffs and all the co-sharer defendants, "if, for any reason the passing of a declaratory decree be not thought proper by the Court." The Court found the plaintiffs entitled to the declaration sought for and framed its decree accordingly. In appeal plaintiffs prayed for joint possession by actual ejectment of the lessees defendants in addition to the declaration already granted, and not by way of alternative. Held that the prayer for ejectment could not be granted as it had been preferred in the plaint only as an alternative. Judgment:—This is a second appeal which could never have come into Court if the plaintiffs had been definitely held to their own pleadings, as they certainly ought to have been. It appears that in the village in suit there was a certain area of waste land, appertaining to a sahmilat patti the proprietary rights in which vested jointly in twenty or more co-sharers. One of these determined to bring a number of plots of this waste land under cultivation, but instead of occupying them himself he granted a perpetual lease of the same to two lessees. About a year and a quarter later the lessees, finding that their rights were being questioned, induced seven more of the co-sharers in the patti to grant them another perpetual lease. The present suit was brought by two co-sharers (subsequently joined by three others) who were dissatisfied with this arrangement. They impleaded as defendants the two lessees, the lessors, and all the remaining co-sharers who had not joined in the suit. The principal relief sought was a declaration that the two leases above referred to "are improper, null and void, and are not fit to be enforced." There was an alternative prayer for a decree for joint possession, in favour of the plaintiffs and all the co-sharer defendants, "if, for any reason, the passing of a declaratory decree be not thought proper by the Court."

The suit was effectively contested by the lessees-defendants alone. They set up a plea which has been found to be unsustainable, alleging a complete partition of the waste lands amongst the co-sharers. They neglected to set up any alternative case, in the event of the Court's holding that the lessors-defendants had exceeded their rights in granting leases in perpetuity; and it seems to me that this was directly due to the frame of the plaint, in which the prayer for joint possession by actual ejectment of the lessees was preferred in the alternative only, and not as a relief consequential on the declaration of the invalidity of the leases.

The fourth issue fixed by the Trial Court was:—"To what relief, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled?" The Court found the plaintiffs entitled to the declaration sought for and framed its decree accordingly. Incidentally, it remarked that the actual ejectment of the lessees-defendants could only be carried out by the Revenue Court.

The latter appealed, and tried to raise the plea that the entire suit as framed was not cognizable by the Civil Court: this plea was repelled and their appeal dismissed. The plaintiffs also appealed. They very cooly alleged that their own prayer for relief by way of a simple declaration was barred by section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, and now prayed for joint possession by actual ejectment of the lessees-defendants in addition to the declaration already granted, and not by way of alternative.

The learned Subordinate Judge devoted almost the whole of his judgment to the appeal of the lessees; he disposed of the plaintiff's appeal in a few lines, quoting authority for the proposition that the ejectment of the lessees could not be ordered in a suit like the present, but neglecting to point out that the prayer for ejectment had only been preferred in the plaint as an alternative, in the event of the Court's holding that a mere suit for a declaration would not lie.

In appeal to this Court the plaintiffs rely mainly on the case of Jagar Nath Ojha v. Ramphal (1). There were no lessees concerned in that case and no question arose as to the existence of an agricultural tenancy. I should not myself have ordered the actual ejectment of the lessees-defendants, because I do not regard them as "mere trespassers," but I do not think this is a proper case for general examination of the question of the right of one co-sharer in joint lands to appropriate to his personal use a portion of the area constructively in the possession of all the joint owners, where there are none of them making any particular use of it. In this litigation such questions could only arise in the event of the Courts holding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a mere declaration without consequential relief; this contingency has not arisen, and the plaintiffs cannot complain of the fact. I dismiss their appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

S. A. No. 492 of 1922, Decided on 10th July 1923, from the decree of the S. J. Meerut, D/-18th February 1922.

Civil P. C., S. 144—Does not apply if auction purchaser is not the decree-holder.

One P, held a decree for money against A, in execution of which he attached certain property. Before that attachment A. had died and his daughter-in-law, the plff. had been impleaded as his legal representative. The plaintiff objected to the attachment contending that it did not belong to A. Her objection was finally allowed in appeal. Meanwhile the property attached had been sold by auction in execution of that decree and purchased by the defendant, Plff. then sued for the recovery of possession of that property or in the alternative for the recovery of Rs. 500, the value of the said property.

Held that S. 144 C. P. C. had no application to the case but the plaintiff should be allowed to obtain possession of the disputed property after refunding to the defendant the amount obtained by her out of the sale proceeds. [P 273 C 2]

Panna Lal—for Appellant.

H. Hasan and S. K. Dar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Premsukh Das held a decree for money against Anwarul Hasan, in execution of which he attached certain property. Before that attachment Anwarul Hasan had died and his daughter-in-law, the present plaintiff respondent, had been impleaded as his legal representative. The plaintiff respondent objected to the attachment of the said property contending that it did not belong to Anwarul Hasan the deceased judgment debtor. Her objection was disallowed by the Court executing the decree but on appeal that objection was upheld and the order of the appellate Court was finally confirmed by this Court.

Meanwhile the property attached had been sold by auction in execution of that decree and purchased by the defendant appellant Balwant Singh. The present suit was filed by the plaintiff respondent for the recovery of possession of that property or in the alternative for the recovery of Rs. 500 the value of the said property. Both the auction purchaser and the decree-holder were made parties to the suit. The Court of first instance dismissed the claim but the lower appellate Court decreed it.

The first question for consideration is whether S. 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure barred the claim.

That provision allows restitution to be made against the decree holder who obtains any benefit under a decree which is afterwards reversed on appeal. It does not allow restitution to be made against a third party. The auction purchaser in the present instance was not the decree-holder and S. 144 C. P. C. has therefore no application. The object of that section is to place the parties to a decree in the position which they would have occupied but for such decree or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed and the relief allowed by that provision can only be claimed against the party to such a decree obtaining the benefit prior to such variation or reversal.

The next point for consideration is whether a suit can be maintained under the circumstances against a bona fide auction purchaser for value who purchased in execution of a decree or order which was subsisting on the date on which the execution sale was held. The original judgment-debtor was not however found to have had a saleable interest in the property sold and if he had no saleable interest it was immaterial whether the decree was subsisting or not because the Court holding the sale would have in that event no jurisdiction to sell the property. The decisions in Rewa Mal v. Ram Kishen Singh (1) and Nawab Zainul Abdin v. Muhammad Asghar Ali Khan (2) do not apply because in the former case there were cross decrees, one of which was sufficient to satisfy the other in execution of which the sale was effected, while in the latter case the decree had been reversed on appeal, the judgment-debtor having in either case a saleable interest in the property, which could have been conveyed by sale to the auction purchaser. In the present case the finding of the appellate Court in the proceeding instituted by the present plaintiff against the sale of the attached property was that it was not liable to sale in execution of the decree or in other words that the original judgment-debtor had not saleable interest therein. The decisions in Pearey Lal v. Hanifunnissa (3) and Dulla v Shib Lal (4) also do not apply. In the former the judgment-debtor had a saleable interest. In the latter the omission to raise an objection prior to the sale operated as a bar to the suit.

It is also contended that the plaintiff respondent had withdrawn the surplus sale proceeds and was thereby precluded from suing for the dispossession of the auction purchaser. But that money was withdrawn before the objection of the plaintiff to the sale of the disputed property was allowed by the appellate Court. The learned counsel for the plaintiff respondent is willing to refund that money to the auction purchaser either in this suit, or in any proceeding which may hereafter be instituted by the auction purchaser for the refund of the sale proceeds. It is open to the auction purchaser to seek his remedy by a separate proceeding, but so far as the present plaintiff respondent, who is the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor is concerned, it is desirable that she should not be allowed to obtain possession without refunding the surplus sale proceeds which she had received and appropriated before her objection was finally allowed. The amount so obtained by her was Rs. 63/6. The appeal is therefore dismissed except in so far that the plaintiff respondent will not be allowed to obtain possession of the disputed property without refunding to the defendant appellant the sum of Rs. 63/6 obtained by her out of the sale proceeds. In view of the bona fides of the auction purchaser the parties are directed to bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal dismissed.

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz.

A Wajib-ul-arz by itself is good prima facie evidence of custom and it is not necessary to corroborate a wajib-ul-arz by proof of instances in which preemption has been allowed. The evidence afforded by the Wajib-ul-arz may be rebutted by other evidence. The fact that the wajib-ul-arz contains many provisions relating to matters of contract does not prevent it being treated also as a record of custom. 8 All. 786; (1908) 5 A.L.J. 539; (1909) 6 A.L.J 715 Diss. [P 275 C 1, 2 P 277 C 1]

S. N. Sen—for Appellant.

Nihal Chand—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.—The sole question for decision in this appeal is whether the existence of a custom of pre-emption which was pleaded by the plaintiffs in the Court below was established on the evidence submitted to the Subordinate Judge.

The property sought to be pre-empted is situated in the Saharanpur district known as Lakhnoti Kalan.

The evidence in support of the custom consisted of a wajib-ul-arz prepared at the settlement of 1867 A. D. Another wajib-ul-arz was prepared in 1296 F. corresponding with 1889. In addition to these two wajib-ul-arzes the plaintiffs produced a decree showing that a claim for pre-emption had been decreed in the Court of the Munsif of Saharanpur in the year 1907. The judgment of the Munsif was based upon the provision of the wajib-ul-arz of 1867 which is in evidence in this case.

There was no rebutting evidence put forward on the part of the defendants.

The full text of the wajib-ul-arz of 1867 is before us and it has been argued at great length that having regard to the language of the document and to certain of its provisions, it ought to be held in this particular case that the wajib-ul-arz is not a record of custom.

In support of his argument the learned Advocate for the appellants has referred us to some of the earlier decisions of this Court in pre-emption cases. He has cited before us the cases of Dhian Singh v. Diwan Singh (1) and Bulh Singh v. Gopal Rai (2) and Tota v. Sheo Narain (3).

While it might be conceded in favour of the appellants that on the earlier decisions of this Court it would be possible to construe the wajib-ul-arz before us in the present case as a record of contract rather than of custom; we are decidedly of opinion that it is not possible for us to follow the reasoning of these earlier cases in view of the pronouncement of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Digambar Singh v. Ahmad Sayed Khan (4). Since that judgment has been published, it has naturally been followed in this Court, and it must be taken that any principles which are laid down in it must be accepted in preference to any statement of law contained in previous decisions of the Court. It was clearly laid down in this case that a wajib-ul-arz by itself is good prima facie evidence of custom and that it is not necessary to corroborate a wajib-ul-arz by proof of instances in which pre-emption has been allowed. At the same time it was laid down that the evidence afforded by the wajib-ul-arz may be rebutted by other evidence.

Since that case was decided the pre-emption Bench of this Court has taken up the position that the wajib-ul-arz is strong prima facie evidence of custom and that in order to overturn the presumption in its favour, there must be convincing evidence to satisfy the Court that in fact the wajib-ul-arz could not reasonably be treated as a record of custom.

The evidence which would rebut the presumption may of course be found in the language of the document itself or there may be external evidence. It has been laid down by the pre-emption Bench in the case reported in Fazal Husain v. Muhammad Sharif (5), that in certain cases the language of the wajib-ul-arz will of itself afford sufficient evidence to overturn the presumption that it contains a record of custom. In that case certain observations were made with reference to the previous decision of this Court in Dhian Singh v. Diwan Singh (1). It was pointed out in that case the wajib-ul-arz was peculiar and that in the clause relating to pre-emption there were to be found "a number of other matters which could not possibly have been matters of custom." It was held accordingly that in such a case it might reasonably be held that the record in the wajib-ul-arz was not really a record of custom but a record of contract.

We have in recent cases endeavoured, as far as possible, to follow this principle laid down in the case just cited and we may also refer in this connection to the case reported in Surajbali Singh v Muhammad Nasir (6).

We have, in the present case, as has been stated, the wajib-ul-arz prepared in the year 1867 and a subsequent wajib-ul-arz prepared in or about the year 1889. This latter wajib-ul-arz merely incorporates the provisions of the earlier document and so it is only necessary to consider the language of the wajib-ul-arz of 1867.

The document begins with a recital that it is the wajib ul-arz dasturdehi of mauza Lakhnoti Kalan. Then there follows the declaration of the share-holders who attested the wajib-ul-arz and following on this we have a number of provisions contained in 20 paragraphs setting out all the usages and arrangements prevailing in the village.

The particular paragraph with which we are concerned, that is to say the paragraph which relates to pre-emption is paragraph No 6 and that undoubtedly lays down in the clearest possible terms that there is a right of pre-emption in the village. In addition to the provisions relating to pre-emption the paragraph refers to a number of other matters concerning the devolution of property. Certain rules are laid down, such, for example, as the exclusion of a daughter's son or a sister's on. Another rule which is laid down in the same paragraph relates to the custom which is known as istribant or chundabant. Obviously, therefore, the paragraph does refer to matters other than pre-emption. At the same time we think it is proper to observe that these other matters so referred to are matters which are capable of being the subject of a custom.

In this connection, however, the learned Advocate for the appellants lays particular stress upon two rules which are laid down in the paragraph in question. One of these is that in cases of dispute about the price of the property offered for sale the question is to be settled by the appointment of arbitrators or by a reference to the Court. It is argued that this provision relates to a matter which cannot properly be said to be the subject of a custom. We do not, however, understand this provision in the sense contended for. It appears to us that the custom of pre-emption being recognised, all that the rule in question lays down is that a certain procedure is to be observed in cases where there is a dispute between the parties regarding the price of the property sold. We have to notice in this connection that in the wajib u' arzes which were before their Lordships of the Privy Council in Digambar Singh's case, (4) there were similar provisions recorded, and it is quite clear that the presence of those provisions in the wajib-ul-arzes in question did not prevent their Lordships of the Privy Council from holding that the wajib-ul-arzes in those cases were to be treated as records of custom.

The only other argument we have to notice in this connection is one which is based upon the language of the concluding sentence of the paragraph in question which lays down that if there be no male issue or no relatives descended from a common ancestor, the share-holders of the patti will become the owners of the property in proportion to their shares. Dr. Sen has argued very earnestly that this provision contained in paragraph 6 cannot properly be treated as relating to any custom He says that it is an endeavour on the part of the co-sharers of this village to prevent the application of the principle of escheat to the Crown in cases where a proprietor dies without leaving any heir. We do not say that this is an impossible construction of the words in question but are very doubtful whether that is the significance of them. It may be that they merely provide a rule or custom whereby other heirs who would take in preference to the Crown are excluded. It is well-known that after the list of all relatives has been exhausted, succession to the property of a deceased Hindu may go to his spiritual preceptor or disciple or even to a Brahman before the Crown can come and claim escheat. We have given this matter our best consideration and we think we ought to hold in the present case that there is no provision in paragraph 6 upon which, acting in accordance with principles laid down, we ought to come to the conclusion that the paragraph does not contain a record of custom. On the contrary, we are of opinion that it does contain such a record.

Something was said in the course of argument regarding the provisions in other paragraphs of the wajib-ul-arz and it is pointed out that many of these provisions relate obviously to matters of contract. That, however, is not a matter of any importance because every wajib-u'-arz must of necessity contain matters which constitute arrangements between the cosharers. The fact that such matters are to be found in a wajib-ul-arz does not prevent the wajib-ul-arz being treated also as a record of custom wherever a clear pronouncement regarding a custom is set out in the document itself.

We have further to notice that the case of the plaintiff is supported by an actual instance in which pre-emption was decreed in the year 1907. To that fact due weight must be given, and we hold accordingly that the wajib-ul-arz supported by the judgment in question which was passed in the year 1907 affords sufficient evidence upon which it was competent to the Court below to find that the custom alleged in the plaint does exist. We have not in any way been convinced that the judgment of the first Court is erroneous.

We notice that in the Court below another plea by way of defence was that the plaintiffs could not maintain this suit as they had consented to the sale and had themselves refused to take the property offered to them. The learned Judge of the Court below was of opinion that the evidence which was offered in support of this plea was not reliable and although the point is taken in the memorandum of appeal to this Court, it was not seriously argued here. We have no reason to differ from the learned Judge of the Court below in his estimate of the evidence in question.

The result, therefore, is the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

(b) Contract Act, S. 253 (10)—Partnership consisting of members of joint Hindu family—Presumption is that partnership is not dissolved on the death of any one partner.

In the case of partnership between members of a joint undivided Hindu family, a stipulation that the partnership will not be dissolved by the death of any one partner is ordinarily to be inferred. [P. 287 C. 2]

✱ (c) Minor—defacto trustee, investment of minor's money by—Suit to recover - Continuation of suit by minor after majority does not amount to ratification.

Where a minor on attaining majority adopts a suit instituted by his Defacto trusteed, to recover the minor's money, to the extent of executing the decree and obtaining payment, his conduct does not amount to ratification and there is nothing to debar his claim that he may have against the trustee. [P. 289 C. 1]

Piggott, J.—The facts out of which this litigation arises may be stated as follows. About the end of the year 1900 there were living in Agra four brothers, named Anandi Lal, Narain Das Ram Dayal and Sham Lal. After the death of their father in the preceding year there had been a separation, accompanied by a complete partition of the joint family assets, between the brothers. This, again was speedily followed by a business partnership between Anandi Lal and Ram Narain. No deed of partnership was ever drawn up, but the two brothers undoubtedly re-united in business, while maintaining their status as separated Hindus. Early in 1901 Anandi Lal fell into ill health ; reading between the lines of the evidence it seems fairly clear that he was suffering from consumption, and knew it. On May 29th, 1901, he drew up his last Will and testatment, which was presented for registration two days later at his residence in the City of Agra. It is admitted that this document (page A 23 of our record) was executed by Anandi Lal and that the following persons signed it as attesting witnesses :—Narain Das and Ram Dayal (two of the brothers), also Dwarka Das, Damodar Das, Makhan Lal, Ghasi Ram and Badri Das. The document begins by reciting the existence of a business partnership between the executant and Narain Das in four specified shops, in which the interest of Anandi Lal is ten-sixteenths and that of Narain Das is six-sixteenths. It then declares that the heirs of the executant, both in respect of his interest in the aforesaid business and in all his other properties, are his wife, Mt. Chameli, and his son Faqira, now two months old. It then proceeds to create an elaborate trust for the benefit of the said Faqira, or Faqir Chand, appointing as trustees Narain Das (the brother) and four of the attesting witnesses, nemely, Makhan Lal, Damodar Das ("who is my relative"). Dwarka Das and Ghasi Ram ("who is my old karinda and a very honest man in whom I have great confidence.") The trustees are to see to it that the partnership business is carried on until Faqira attains majority and elaborate instructions are laid down for their guidance. Provision is made for contingencies which never in fact occurred, such as the premature death of Faqira, the adoption by Mt. Chameli of another son, or the death of that lady herself. Mt. Chameli takes a monthly allowance of forty rupees, with a lump sum in the event of her desiring to go on pilgrimage ; the remaining assets are to be held in trust wholly for the benefit of the minor son. In no event, not even if Faqira should die and no son be adopted in his place, shall Mt. Chameli "have any power or right to interfere with my business is any way." The executors or trustees may fill up vacancies in their own body caused by death. They are to see the business carried on "with their advice, consultation and unanimity. They should watch and protect the whole of my property, and no such measure should be adopted as may lead to the waste of any part of my money or property." Only in certain specified eventualities are they empowered to dissolve the business partnership. In the meantime they "should keep defraying the expenses incurred in maintaining Faqira, my minor son, and imparting education, etc,, and also the proper expenses incurred in marriages, funerals, illness, etc."

There has been some little controversy before us as to how far the persons who signed this document as attesting witnesses are affected with notice of its contents. I think I may dispose of this point briefly and at once. On the pleadings and the evidence, as well as in consideration of the manifest probabilities of the case, I have no doubt that the trustees or executors named in the Will, when they attested this document, did so with full knowledge of the trust thereby created and of their own appointment as executors : also, that by signing it they intended to signify, and did in fact signify, their own acceptance of the trust. It is a more arguable point how far any of them, and more particulary Narain Das and Ghasi Ram, are bound, in virtue of their signatures, to an admission of any recitals in the deed regarding the nature and extent of the partnership business, or of Anandi Lal's share in the same. I note, however, that the more material points, such as the designation and location of the four shops and the specifications of the shares of Anandi Lal and Narain Das, are admitted in the pleadings. The question of the accuracy of Anandi Lal's assertion that his personal share in the partnership capital amounted to Rs. 58,000 on the date of the Will, does not arise at the stage which the litigation has now reached.

Anandi Lal died on the 13th October 1901. It is alleged by the defendants to this suit that, in the interval, namely, on the 27th June 1901, he and Narain Das executed, each in favour of the other, two unregistered documents (Exs-A and B pp. 25 and 26 of the Record) which materially modified the conditions of the partnership. The defendants are put to proof of these documents and the question whether they have proved the same will be discussed in due course.

In the month of October 1905 Narain Das was on his death-bed, and he died on the 23rd of the month. Two days previously he executed three documents around which the controversy in this litigation largely hinges : they were presented for registration by Narain Das at his own residence in the City of Agra, on the 23rd October 1905, within about four hours of his death. They are marked Exhibits C. F and E and are re-produced at pages R. 27 to R 37 of our record.

Two of these, viz., Exhibits F and E, are documents of which Narain Das is the sole executant, their execution is admitted, the controversy is as to their binding effect, if any, on the interests of Faqir Chand. Their main importance lies in the fact that their drafting, execution and registration formed part of the same transaction as resulted in the preparation and partial registration of the remaining document, Exhibit C. It will be convenient to examine the three documents at once. Exhibit E, executed by Narain Das alone, and duly registered in his name, recites that the executant is the owner of a half share in a certain building in the City of Agra, "in the kothi of Mr. Campbell," originally purchased by him jointly with his brother Anandi Lal. He relinquishes this moiety share to Faqira, minor son of Anandi Lal and owner of the other moiety, in lieu of a sum of Rs. 6,500 for which the executant has already received credit upon a settlement of partnership accounts between himself and the lawful guardians of the said minor. Exhibit F is the last will and testament of Narain Das. It was undoubtedly executed by him and duly registered in his name under the circumstances already stated. It starts with the dissolution of the partnership between himself and Faqira, treated as an accomplished fact, the executant describing himself as the sole owner of the seven shops into which the partnership business appears to have now expanded. It ricites that the executant leaves as his sole heirs his wife, Mt. Pisto, and his daughter, Mt. Munni : it appoints as executors to carry on the business for the benefit of the said heirs three persons. One is Ghasi Ram, the faithful servant whom Anandi Lal had already chosen as one of the trustees under his will, the other two are the surviving brothers. Ram Dayal and Sham Lal. Mt. Pisto is given authority to adopt a son after the testator's death. The executors are to carry on the business, the control of which is vested in Ram Dayal and Sham Lal ; but minute directions are given in respect of a variety of matters, including the apportionment of the profits. It is laid down that the first charge on the net profits is to be a deduction of ten annas per cent. in favour of the legatees ; the balance is to be divided, one fourth going to Ghasi Ram and three-fourths to the executors for the benefit of the legatees. In one particular shop Dwarka Das and Ratan Lall are given an interest of a one-eighth share each in the profits, after the deduction of ten annas per cent. ; while a similar interest to the extent of three-sixteenths of the profits is created in favour of a servant of the firm named Chhatar Mal. Provision is made for the remuneration of these three men by monthly salaries in the event of the shops in which they are concerned being carried on at a loss ; but there is no similar provision in respect of Ghasi Ram. The provisions of the will which purport to affect the minor Faqira are important enough to be worth quoting textually :—"I have to pay Rs. 44,439 to Faqira minor on account of the share of Anandi Lal in partnership business, and Rs. 2,000 belonging to Faqira minor which is with me for meeting the expenses of a dharamsala and I shall pay the same. If I fail to do so the said executors shall have power to take out of the funds of my business Rs. 44,439 due to Faqira minor and purchase any property with the said amount. Lala Ram Dayal and Sham Lal aforesaid shall have power to keep the money in deposit with them so long as they do not acquire any property, to meet the expenses of Mt. Chameli, widow of Anandi Lal, and Faqira minor with the interest on the said money, to take a receipt from the executors of Anandi Lal when property is purchased and to look after the minor and the property. Lala Ram Dayal and Sham Lal shall keep in deposit with them Rs. 2,000 out of the fund of my business and Rs. 2,000 due to Faqira minor aforesaid, in all Rs. 4,000, and shall continue to meet the expenses of the joint dharamsala of me the executant and Anandi Lal."

I now come to the important document. Exhibit C. It purports to be a bilateral agreement for the dissolu- of the partnership referred to in the will of Anandi Lal, and to be executed by Narain Das on the one side and on the other by Makhan Lal, Damodar Das, Ghasi Ram and Dwarka Das, the four remaining trustees, on behalf of the minor Faqira, as well as by Mt. Chameli "as the guardian of her minor son Faqira." It begins with a statement of the partnership business, specifying the seven shops to which it had by this time extended, and speaking of the same as "carried on in partnership with Anandi Lal deceased whose son is Faqira minor." It then continues :—"The accounts of the said shops have now been examined and the partnership has been dissolved. Rs. 2,939 have, after allowing credit for the money for the construction of the dharamsala, been found due to Faqira, minor aforesaid son of Anandi Lal, and I, Lala Narain Das aforesaid, Second Party became the owner of the entire business of the said shops, money dealings and all kinds of goods and articles in the shops." The remaining executants, described as the "First party" purport to acknowledge the receipt of this sum of Rs. 52,939 in full discharge of all claims on the part of the minor in respect of his share in the partnership, according to the following detail :—

(a) Rs. 6500 is credited back to Narain Das as the price of a moiety share referred to in the agreement, Exhibit C.

(b) Rs. 2,000 are to be made over to Ram Dayal and Sham Lal on the understanding that they will pay interest on the same at 6 per cent. per annum and apply this interest to "meeting the expenses of the dharamsala."

(c) Rs. 44,439 Narain Das acknowledges to be in deposit with himself, nd he says that he will "purchase property" with the same within three months. Until this is done, however, this very considerable sum of money is to be deposited with Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, and the document continues :—"The interest of the said money shall continue to be accumulated and the exp nses of Mt. Chameli and the minor aforesaid shall be met therefrom. Lala, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal shall be liable to look after the property which exists at present or shall be purchased in future, the said minor and the business which may be carried on in future" The result of these transactions considered as a whole, on the position of Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, is peculiar. Under the will of Narain Das they become the de facto managers of the partnership business. Out of the assets of that business they are to take Rs. 44,439 plus Rs. 2,000 and use the same at their discretion, provided they keep up a certain dharamsala and take over from the trustees all responsibility for the maintenance of Mt. Chameli and her minor son. If ink and paper can do it, the trustees have divested themselves of all responsibility and handed over their duties, along with the assets of the minor, to two brothers of Anandi Lal whom that gentleman, whatever may have been his reasons, had carefully excluded altogether from the provisions of his will, Sham Lal tells us in his deposition (P. 71R) that as a matter of fact, he used the deposit of Rs. 44,439 to start a shop under the name of "Chhatar Mal-Anandi Lal," which was closed after carrying on business for eight or nine years. Out of the profits of this shop he supported the minor and Mt. Chameli and he holds to the credit of Faqir Chand a balance now amounting to Rs. 47,000 and Rs 48,000.

Faqir Chand must have attained his majority sometime in the month of March 1919. In may of that year he issued notices to his two surviving trustees, Makhan Lal and Ghasi Ram, and to Nanaq Ram, son of Narain Das, in which he asked for an account of their dealings with the partnership business in which he claimed a ten-sixteenths share in accordance with the provisions of his father's will. He intimated, further, that he desired a dissolution of the partnership and separated possession over his own share in the accumulated assets. He received very guarded replies, drafted and forwarded under legal advice The most significant passage in these replies is to be found in the second paragraph of that sent in by Ghasi Ram, which is to the following effect :—"All the accounts of Lala Faqir Chand were settled with Mt. Chameli, natural guardian and mother of the said Lala Faqir Chand, in the lifetime of Lala Narain Das, and she took all the accounts and the partnership was dissolved. The whole amount including interest etc., which was found due to Lala Faqir Chand was deposited with Lala Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, proprietors of the firm of Chhater Mal-Ram Dayal, and Faqir Chand and his mother benefited by the said sum and set up even a separate business with it." The result was the institution, on the 12th of July 1919, of the suit with which we are now concerned. Lala Faqir Chand, as plaintiff, impleads seven persons as defendants. The first three are Nanag Ram, described in the plaint as alleging himself to be the adopted son of Lala Narain Das, Mt. Pisto widow of the said Narain Das, and Mt. Mohan Dei, his daughter, these three are impleaded as representing between them the entire estate of Narain Das. The fourth defendant is Ghasi Ram, impleaded as a trustee under the Will of Anandi Lal and also as a partner in the firm. The next two defendants are Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, impleaded as the de facto managers of the partnership business, and also as persons into whose hands assets of that business in which the plaintiff claims a share have actually passed. The remaining defendant is Lala Makhan Lal, the other surviving trustee. It is an admitted fact that, besides Narain Das himself, two other trustees, namely, Dwarka Das and Damodar Das, had died prior to the institution of the suit. The plaint is a lengthy document and it does not seem to me surprising, under the circumstances, that the plaintiff should have spread his net wide and appealed to the Court in broad terms to give him such relief as might be found appropriate, after a complete investigation of the facts, and against such persons as, upon the facts so ascertained, might be found liable. Undoubtedly, the plaint as drafted is, first and foremost, a claim for dissolution of partnership and settlement of accounts between the plaintiff and the remaining partners. It is equally certain that the liability of Ghasi Ram, as trustee under the Will of Anandi Lal, is asserted and made part of the cause of action, while Makhan Lal is impleaded solely and entirely by reason of his liability as a surviving trustee. I am further of opinion, though I do not regard the point as material, that as against the heirs of Narain Das the plaint is so drafted as to claim relief against the estate of Narain Das, both on the ground of partnership in the business, and on the ground of that gentleman's position as one of the trustees The pleadings of the first three defendants raised a question which is certainly not before us now in appeal Mt. Mohan Dei denied the adoption of Nanag Ram and apparently wished to have it put in issue at this trial. So far as we are now concerned, we take it as established, and not contested by any pleadings now before us, that Nanaq Ram was validly adopted by Mt. Pisto, widow of Narain Das, and that he is in fact, as he has asserted himself to be throughout this litigation, the heir of Narain Das and the representative of his estate. In his written statement, as well as in that of Ghasi Ram, various pleas were taken more or less of technical character. These defendants were obviously anxious to tie the plaintiff down to a suit for dissolution of partnership pure and simple, so that the suit might fail altogether in the event of the Court's finding that the partnership had ceased to exist on some date in the year 1905. They made it a grievance that,if the plaintiff desired to enforce any liability against the trustees appointed in his father's Will,he should not have impleaded the heirs of legal representatives of the deceased trustees, Damodar Das and Dwarka Das. Nanag Ram distinctly pleaded that the partnership was dissolved by the agreement,Exhibit C of the 21st of October 1905, insisting on the fact that this agreement was entered into, not only with Mt. Chameli but with all the trustees other than Narain Dsa himself.He contended that this dissolution of partnership was preceded by an honest and thorough examination of the accounts and that the plaintiff was given his full share in the partnership assets. In respect of that share it was pleaded that, although the original partnership between Anandi Lal and Narain Das had undoubtedly been entered into on the basis that the former held a share of ten-sixteenths and the latter one of six-sixteenths only, this arrangement had been modified by the execution of the two documents, Exhibits A and B of the 27th of June 1901 already referred to, in accordance with which the shares of the partners had been fixed from that date at one moiety each. There was also a plea to the effect that the plaintiff had so benefited by the settlement embodied in the agreement of the 21st of October 1905, and approbated the same since he attained majority, that he was in some way estopped from attempting to go behind that settlement. The written statement of Ghasi Ram follows much the same lines. There has been some little argument before us as to whether Ghasi Ram did or did not admit himself to have been at any time a partner in the business referred to in the plaint. I do not think there can be any real doubt as to the position taken up by Ghasi Ram. He never admitted having been a partner of the plaintiffs at any time, his case being that the partnership in which the plaintiff was concerned came to an end in October 1905. But he did admit having become a partner in business with the heirs and successors of Narain Das from the date of that gentleman's death, and I might add that it is obvious that he did become a partner under the terms of the Will of Narain Das. In one particular, the written statement filed by Nanag Ram goes beyond that of Ghasi Ram. The latter, in my opinion, distinctly pins himself down to the plea of a dissolution of partnership effected in the lifetime of Narain Das by the execution of the deed, Exhibit C. The former, in paragraph 32 of his defence, does put forward as a sort of alternative pleading the allegation that any partnership existing in the lifetime of Narain Das was, in any event, dissolved by that gentleman's death. Of the remaining defendants, Ram Dayal entered no appearance. Sham Lal filed a brief written statement, in which he alleged that he,at any rate, had no concern in any business in which the plaintiff was ever a partner, that the plaint disclosed no cause of action as against him, that he had kept full accounts of all monies entrusted to him for the benefit of the plaintiff, and that he was ready at any moment to pay into Court any sum of money which the Court might direct. I think I may fairly add in this connection that, although Ram Dayal entered no formal appearance, there are a number of pleadings on the record which show that he practically made common cause with Sham Lal and the two fought the case together. At one stage of the trial in the Court below these defendants offered to pay into Court a substantial sum of money which they admitted themselves to be holding in deposit on the plaintiff's account. At the last moment, however, the Counsel representing these defendants insisted that his clients would make no such payment into Court, unless the plaintiff were prepared to accept the same as a full and complete discharge of their liability towards him. As the plaintiff, not unnaturally, declined to accept any such condition, no deposit was ever made.The last defendant, Makhan Lal, was eventually exempted by the plaintiff from his claim. He went into the witness-box on the plaintiff's behalf and gave evidence of considerable i nportance to which I shall have to refer later. There has been no little controversy as to the credibility of the evidence given by Makhan Lal, and it has been suggested that he has colluded with the plaintiff and made statement in the latter's favour, in return for the latter's exempting him from liability in respect of any misconduct or negligence in the performance of his duties as one of the trustees. On this point I think I might say at once that Makhan Lal, on his showing, did so neglect his duties as a trustee that it would have been open to the plaintiff, as a matter of law, to hold him liable, in the last resort, for any loss which the plaintiff might prove that he had suffered in consequence of such neglect. On the other hand, it is obvious enough that Makhan Lal, from the plaintiff's point of view is not worth powder and shot. There is no reason to doubt that the defendants Nanag Ram, Ghasi Ram, Ram Dayal and Shyam Lal are in a position between them to make good to the plaintiff any sum which may be found due to him, and the latter had no adequate motive for pressing his case against Makhan Lal.

What I have called the technical pleas sought to be raised by various defendants have no real force. As a matter of fact, in the conclusions at which I have arrived on the main issues of fact and of law, the plaintiff has made out his case for relief by way of a decree for dissolution of partnership and rendition of accounts; but in any case I think he was quite entitled, in one and the same suit, to claim relief either as a partner in a subsisting business, or in the alternative as against trustees who had played ducks and drakes with his interests during his minority. Nor was he bound to implead the legal representatives of the deceased trustees Damodar Das and Dwarka Das. The liability of the trustees was joint and several and the defendant Nanag Ram being impleaded principally on the allegation of a subsisting partnership, although his possible liability as an heir in possession of the assets of a defaulting trustee, was also included. The position of the defendants, Ram Daya and Sham Lal, was certainly peculiar; but it arose naturally and inevitably out of the responsibilities which they took upon themselves in connection with the Will of Narain Das and the transactions which followed thereupon. If the plaintiff succeeds in making out his case that there had never been any dissolution in law of the partnership which subsisted between himself and Narain Das the position of these two defendants seems to me clear enough. As executors under the Will of Narain Das they virtually took over the entire assets of the partnership business and made themselves responsible for its management. They chose to open certain books of account, according to which the greater part of the business was carried on as a business in which the partners were Ghasi Ram and the heirs of Narain Das, three other employees of the firm being remunerated by way of a percentage on the profits earned by particular branches of the business. One shop was carried on in the building at Agra referred to in the exhibits as the kothi of Mr. Campbell. This the defendants elected to treat as a separate business, carried on for the benefit of Faqir Chand alone, the capital of which was stated to be a specified sum and earmarked as the separate property of this particular person. The plaintiff, however, supposing that he makes good his plea as to there having been no legal dissolution of the partnership, is entitled to go behind this artificial division of the partnership assets and to have all the shops carried on under the management of Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, including the shop described as that of Chhater Mal. Anandi Lal in Mr. Campbell's kothi at Agra, treated as branches of one and the same partnership business. As the de facto managers of this business, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal are liable, along with Nanag Ram and Ghasi Ram, to render to the plaintiff true accounts of the same. As to any liability which might attach to these two defendants in the alternative, that is to say, in the event of its being found against the plaintiff that the previously existing partnership was dissolved, either on the 21st of October 1905 by the execution of the document. Exhibit C, or on the 23rd of October 1905, at the death of Narain Das, this question does not really arise in view of the findings I propose to record on the main issues in the case. I am, however, clearly of opinion that, on any possible view of the pleadings, these two defendants were admittedly liable to the plaintiff for a sum of money stated by Sham Lal himself in his deposition to be something between Rs. 47,000 and Rs. 48,000. This is the first case I have ever come across in which two defendants against whom relief was undoubtedly sought (at least in the alternative) by way of a decree for money, who admit themselves to be liable to the plaintiff for a large sum of money, have had the entire suit against them dismissed, merely on the ground that they had offered to pay that money into Court, but had eventually declined to do so except upon a condition which it was obviously impossible for the plaintiff to accept.

The case went to trial in the Court below upon a multitude of issues, loosely framed and overlapping one another to such an extent that seven out of the thirteen issues were finally lumped together by the Trial Court when it came to write its judgment. In substance, the learned Subordinate Judge has found that the agreement, Exhibit A and Exhibit B of the 27th of June 1901, are proved, so that from this date Anandi Lal and Narain Das became owners of the partnership business in equal shares. He has found that the agreement, Exhibit C, of the 21st of October 1905, was duly executed by all the persons who purport to have executed it, that it is binding on the plaintiff, that it operated as a dissolution of the previously existing partnership and as a complete discharge, in favour of Narain Das and his heirs after him, in respect of all liabilities in connection with the said partnership. Curiously enough, as it seems to me, this finding has nevertheless been qualified. The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the settlement of accounts effected on the 21st of October 1905 was incomplete, in that it failed to take into account the profits for the last year of the partnership. He has held that the heirs of Narain Das (from the use of this word in the plural I presume that he means defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3) are liable to render an account to the plaintiff from a date somewhat vaguely specified in the decree up to either the 21st or the 23rd of October 1905, the period indicated being apparently the last of the partnership. The Trial Court has further found, in the alternative, that if the previously subsisting partnership was not dissolved on the 21st of October 1905 it came to an end two days later (October 23rd 1905), on the death of Narain Das, by operation of the principle of law embodied in S. 253, clause (10), of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872. He has held that all the defendants, other than the heirs of Narain Das, are exempt from liability so far as this suit is concerned, because the suit could only be treated as one for dissolution of partnership and rendition of accounts, and could succeed, if at all, on that basis alone. Against the decree framed in accordance with these findings the plaintiff has filed First Appeal No. 239 of 1920. The memorandum of appeal is unnecessarily prolix and argumentative. Some of the paragraphs are merely pleas, to the effect that the conclusions arrived at by the Court below are wrong. A number of others are directed against details in the procedure followed in the Trial Court: none of these seemed to me of any particular consequence, or to be seriously pressed upon us in the course of argument A large number of pleas, argumentative in form, attack the finding of the Trial Court as to the execution of the deed, Exhibit C, of the 21st of October 1905 by the trustees other than Narain Das and Ghasi Ram, and as to its validity against the plaintiff, either by reason of its execution by Mt. Chameli, or in the event of its execution by the whole body of trustees being proved. Along with this question it will be necessary to take the question whether the two unregistered deeds, Exhibits A and B, of the 27th of June 1901, are genuine and valid. For one thing, the settlement of the 21st of October 1905 avowedly proceeds upon the basis that Anandi Lal and Narain Das were partners in equal shares on the date of Anandi Lal's death; it being admitted that the partnership was constituted on the basis that Anandi Lal held a ten-sixteenths and Narain Das a six sixteenths share, the agreement of the 21st of October 1905 fails, independently of any other considerations unless the contesting defendants can prove affirmatively that Anandi Lal had agreed before his death to an arrangement which reduced his share in the divisible profits to half. Moreover, it so happens that a signature purporting to be that of the trustee Damodar Das who is a brother of Mt. Chameli, the widow of Anandi Lal, appears as an attesting witness both to Exhibit A (Anandi Lal's agreement of the 27th of June 1901) and as an executant of Exhibit C (the agreement of the 21st October 1905). It was a matter of particular importance for the defendants to prove that Damodar Das had signed both these documents, and the result is that a mass of evidence has been produced on this point which must, in my opinion, either be accepted as proving the signature of Damodar Das to both documents, or must be held insufficient to prove his signature to either. Of the remaining pleas in the plaintiff's memorandum of appeal there are only two which seem to require notice. One is against the Trial Court's finding by which Ghasi Ram is exempted from all liability to render accounts and awarded his full costs, the other relates to the entire dismissal of the suit as against the defendants Ram Dayal and Sham Lal. We have also before us a petition of objections by the defendant-respondent, Sham Lal, to the effect that the Trial Court ought to have awarded him his costs. Finally, a separate appeal, First Appeal No. 347 of 1921, has been filed by the defendant, Nanag Ram. This defendant, not unnaturally as it seems to me, contends that the Court below, on its own findings was clearly mistaken in passing any decree whatever against him. If the agreement, Exhibit C, of the 21st of October 1905, is a duly executed document and binding on the plaintiff, it must operate as a full discharge of Narain Das from all liability in respect of the partnership accounts other than the liability stated in the agreement itself. It has been conceded before us in argument that, if this Court on the plaintiff's appeal, arrives at the conclusion, either that the deed, Exhibit C, is not proved to have been executed by all the trustees under the Will of Anandi Lal, or that this document even if so executed is not binding on the plaintiff, or does not operate as a full discharge in favour of Narain Das, then there is nothing in this appeal which can be pressed.

I now take up the two main issues of fact in the case, which (for reasons already stated) I think must be considered together.

Is it proved that Anandi Lal executed the agreement, Exhibit A, of June 27th, 1901?

Is it proved that Makhan Lal, Damodar Das and Dwarka Das, that is to say, the trustees other than Narain Das and Ghasi Ram, executed the agreement, Exhibit C, of October 21st 1905?

I have come to the conclusion that the finding on both these issues must be in the negative, and that it is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the further questions of law which could only arise in the event of an affirmative finding on the question of execution.

[The judgment then discussed the evidence relevant to the issues and while coming to the question of registration continued as follows:—]

While I am on this question of registration, there is a point of law on which it is perhaps expedient that I should express an opinion, namely, the effect of the non-registration of this document on behalf of four of the executants, Makhan Lal, Damodar Das, Ghasi Ram and Dwarka Das. It is not a question whether the partnership business purporting to be thereby dissolved did, or did not, in the month of October 1905, possess immoveable property of the value of Rs. 100, and upwards. The document itself avoids making any statement on the subject, taking refuge in an "et cetra", just where one would have expected a reference to such immoveable property. When, however, the executants come to specify what is being done about the sum of Rs. 52,939 which represents the share of Faqir Chand in the partnership assets, it does distinctly state that Rs. 6,500 of the above are written off in consideration of the transfer by Narain Das of his moiety share " in godown No. 1564 in the kothi of Mr. Campbell. Belanganj, Agra. " In my opinion this provision does make the document in question an instrument which acknowledges the receipt of payment of consideration on account of the assignment of extinction of a right, title or interest in immoveable property of the value of more than Rs. 100, within the meaning of these words as they appear in section 17 (1) of the Indian Registration Act. XVI of 1908. Apart, therefore, from other considerations, the non-registration of this document makes it inoperative in so far as it purports to affect those of the executants in respect of whom it was never registered.

Returning from this digression to the question of the execution of the document, there is one last argument from probability which I ought perhaps to notice before recording my conclusion. It has been strongly pressed upon us on behalf of the respondents that the arrangements made in this document were in fact acted upon from the date of its execution, and must have been so acted upon to the knowledge of the trustees under the Will of Anandi Lal, and more particularly of Makhan Lal and Damodar Das. The suggestion is, that these two men at any rate, if they had not actually joined in the execution of Exhibit C at the time, must have seen from the way in which the business was being carried on that a dissolution of the partnership had actually taken place, must have been put upon enquiry and must, therefore, have come to know of the existence of Exhibit C and have denounced it as a forgery long before the institution of the present suit. This argument sounds plausible and is not without real force, though I very much doubt whether a mere argument from probability could, under the circumstances of this case, be used to supplement the failure of the defendants to prove the execution of the document by the best available evidence. I have come to the conclusion however that the whole force of the argument is gravely discounted when we come to consider the evidence given by the defendants. Ghasi Ram and Sham Lal, at to what was actually done after the death of Narain Das. Under the terms of that gentleman's Will the whole management of what had previously been the partnership business passed into the hands of Ram Dayal, Sham Lal and Ghasi Ram, the two first named being the responsible managers. There had previously been one of the shops belonging to the partnership firm carried on in the building in Mr. Campbell's kothi, and this was treated as the head-office of the firm. After the death of Narain Das this head-office was removed to another location in the City of Agra. I am by no means clear on the evidence whether there was any real interval between this removal of the head-office and what the defendants call the re-starting of the new shop in the very same building, for the sole and separate benefit of the minor Faqir Chand. In any case, the interval was one of a few months only. A trustee of the minor, who was not scrupulously interesting himself in the discharge of his duties, would only see, at most, that there had been a change in the disposition or arrangement of the shops belonging to the partnership; but that (it may be after some brief interval) a shop of the same description as had existed previously was being carried on in the same locality, by the same persons who were the de facto managers of the entire partnership business. I do not consider that anything happened which was likely, on the face of it, to arouse the suspicions of Makhan Lal or Damodar Das and to put them upon enquiry. A careful examination of the partnership accounts and of the accounts maintained by Sham Lal and Ram Dayal in respect of the shop in Mr. Campbell's kothi might no doubt have suggested the necessity for enquiry in the interests of the minor; but I find nothing incredible in the evidence given by Makhan Lal as to his failure to make such an enquiry or seriously improbable in the suggestion that Damodar Das was equally negligent. So long as Mt. Chameli and her minor son were being kept in reasonable comfort, and so long as such matters as the marriage of the minor were properly arranged for in due course and the necessary funds supplied by Sham Lal and Ram Dayal, Mt. Chameli was not likely to make any complaint, or to appeal to the executors of her husband's Will to look into the condition of the partnership accounts. I am of opinion, therefore, that no valid inference in favour of the defendants can be drawn from the fact that neither Makhal Lal nor Damodar Das ever denounced this document, exhibit C, as a forgery at any time prior to the institution of the present suit.

My finding, therefore, on the issue now under consideration is that it is not proved that Anandi Lal executed the agreement, Exhibit A, of the 27th of June 1901; and it is not proved that Makhan Lal, Damodar Das and Dwarka Das executed the agreement, Exhibit C. of October the 21st 1905.

I now pass on to consider two questions of law which are not concluded by the findings of fact hitherto recorded.

The first of these is, whether the previously subsisting partnership was dissolved by the death of Narain Das on the 23rd of October 1903. The law on the subject is contained in S. 253 (10) of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872. The law itself is simple enough: whether the partnership be regarded as one entered into for the term of the minority of Faqir Chand, or whether it be not so regarded, the death of Narain Das dissolved the partnership " in the absence of any contract to the contrary." In a country where the terms of a partnership are usually embodied in a regular instrument such a provision is not difficult of application. In this country partnerships amongst members of one and the same family are very commonly entered into without any formal partnership deed, and in the case now before us no such deed was ever drawn up as between Anandi Lla and Narain Das. As betwen Anandilal and Narain Das the question we have to consider is whether a stipulation that this partnership would not be dissolved by the death of either or both of the partners, but would continue on the lines of a joint family business, at least until Faqir Chand exercised an option one way or the other on attaining his majority, can be fairly inferred from the established facts and the circumstances of the case generally The Courts in this country have frequently held that in the case of a partnership between members of a joint undivided Hindu family, a stipulation that the partnership will not be dissolved by the death of any one partner is ordinarily to be inferred. The only case to which we were referred in argument, of which the facts present any real analogy to those now before us, is that of Muhammad Kamil v. Haji Hedayatulla (1). On the principles there laid down the partnership between Anandi Lal and Narain Das would ordinarily have been dissolved by the death of Anandi Lal; that, it seems to me, we are on absolutely firm ground in holding that that partnership was not then dissolved by reason of a contract to the contrary, perfectly understood by both the parties and assented to by Narain Das when he signed the will of Anandi Lal as an attesting witness. In the course of argument before us, as the importance of this point became obvious, the learned Counsel who was arguing the case for the respondents contended, or at least suggested, that we ought to hold that the original partnership of Anandi Lal and Narain Das was dissolved by the death of the former and that we are dealing with a new partnership entered into by Narain Das on the one hand and his minor nephew Faqir-Chand (as represented by the trustees or executors named in the Will of Anandi Lal) on the other. There is not a trace of any such contention to be found in the pleadings of the defendants, or in any part of the record as it stood up to the conclusion of the trial in the Court below. Even if the defendants had raised the point, I think it must have been decided against them. I have already recorded my opinion that when Narain Das signed the Will of Anandi Lal as an attesting witness, he did so with a full knowledge of its contents and he intended by his signature to certify both his knowledge of the contents and his acceptance of the trusteeship. I am satisfied, therefore, that Anandi Lal and Narain Das agreed amongst themselves that their partnership would not be dissolved by the death of the former (an event which was clearly anticipated as inevitable before long), but should continue as a partnership between Narain Das and the minor Faqir Chand. I am not prepared to say that it seems to be equally obvious that it was part of the agreement that neither upon the death of Narain Das should the partnership be dissolved; but there are two or three considerations which strike me as weighty, and indeed decisive. (a) The partnership between Anandi Lal and Narain Das was not precisely a partnership between members of a joint undivided Hindu family. The two brothers had separated after their father's death and they certainly did not re-unite for all purposes. Each of them obviously regarded his interest in the partnership business as his own separate property, over which he retained full powers of testamentary disposal and which would descend, in the absence of such disposal, to his own heirs, instead of devolving upon the other by right of survivorship. The fact remains, however, that it was a partnership between two brothers, and there is nothing surprising or abnormal in the suggestion that the partners, as between themselves, regarded it as subject to the ordinary incidents of a joint family partnership, i.e., as an arrangement which would continue between their heirs after them until formally dissolved at the instance of one or other member of the partnership. (b) It seems to me that it would be altogether anomalous to hold that A and B entered into a contract of partnership which would not be dissolved upon the death of A, but would be dissolved upon the death of B. (c) I am further greatly impressed with the conduct of Narain Das on the 21st of October 1905. It seems to me a matter of clear inference from his conduct on that date that Narain Das himself did not regard the partnership as one which would be automatically dissolved by his own death. He drew up the three documents Exhibits C, E and F in imminent expectation of death, and he actually died within a few hours of their presentation to the Registration Officer. It would have been easy for him to draw up a Will based upon the assertion that the partnership would be automatically dissolved by his own death and making suitable provision for that contingency. The force of this argument is no doubt somewhat weakened by my finding against the genuineness of Exhibit C; but the Will of Narain Das itself proceeds upon the assumption of a partnership already dissolved by previous arrangement. It seems to me a matter for fair inference that Narain Das himself did not regard the partnership as one which would be automatically dissolved by his death.

For these reasons I am of opinion that a contract to the contrary, within the meaning of that expression in S. 253 (10) of the Indian Contract Act, may fairly be inferred from the established facts of the present case and that the partnership did not come to an end under the provisions of clause (10) of that section when Narain Das breathed his last.

The next question of law is as to the alleged ratification by the plaintiff of the agreement of October the 21st 1905 after he attained majority. The learned Sub-ordinate Judge framed an issue on this point, but he has not really decided it. He takes note of the fact that the plaintiff had actually been maintained during his minority, all the expenses of his marriage met, and so forth, out of funds in the hands of the defendants, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, which they purport to provide from the profits of a shop, which they were carrying on as the separate business of the minor plaintiff. He does not appear to me, however, to have recorded any definite finding as to whether this circumstance, or any action taken by the plaintiff after he attained majority, would serve to estop the latter from claiming any of the reliefs sought in the present suit. On the findings at which I have arrived the plaintiff is obviously entitled to treat the business carried on by Ram Dayal and Sham Lal at the shop in Mr. Campbell's kothi as part and parcel of partnership business, and the fact that money derived from the profits of that shop was applied for his benefit during his minority in no way affects the present suit, except in so far as the defendants may claim credit for the said expenditure upon a fair settlement of accounts. The action taken by the plaintiff since he attained majority, which has been suggested as amounting to a ratification of the agreement of October, the 21st 1905, cannot possibly have any such effect. It appears that Ram Dayal and Sham Lal had invested a portion of the funds which they held to the credit of the plaintiff by lending the money out on mortgage. They had brought a suit upon the mortgage and obtained a decree. When the plaintiff attained majority he adopted this transaction to the extent of executing the decree and obtaining payment. He was obviously entitled to do this without prejudice to any claim which he might have against Ram Dayal and Sham Lal or against any other of the defendants, for money due to him upon a complete settlement of accounts. Indeed, the proceedings in execution of the decree could scarcely have been continued after Faqir Chand attained majority by any one but Faqir Chand himself, and the money would have been lost altogether if the plaintiff had not taken action. The money thus realised by him will have to be taken into account upon a final settlement between the parties, but there is nothing about the plaintiff's conduct in this matter to debar him from maintaining the present suit.

(c) Where a minor on attaining majority adopts a suit instituted by his defacto trustees to recover the minor's money to the extent of executing the decree and obtaining payment, his conduct does not amount to ratification and there is nothing to debar his claim that he may have against the trustee.

From the findings which have now been recorded it is obvious that the appeal of Nanag Ram, First Appeal No. 347 of 1921, must fail and there is nothing for us to do but to dismiss the same with costs, including fees on the higher scale. Similarly, the cross-objections taken by the respondent Sham Lal in First Appeal No. 239 of 1920 also fail and must be dismissed with costs.

The form of decree which requires to be substituted for the very inadequate decree passed in favour of the plaintiff by the Trial Court requires careful and detailed consideration. To begin with, the plaintiff has substantially succeeded in his appeal and, whatever else may happen; he is entitled to the costs of this appeal, including fees on the higher scale. I would award him these costs jointly and severally against the defendants-respondents Nanag Ram, Ghasi Ram, Ram Dial and Sham Lal.

Secondly, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to a preliminary decree for dissolution of partnership and settlement of accounts as against the same four defendants. Strictly speaking, the decree for dissolution of partnership must be against Nanag Ram and Ghasi Ram alone; but I would include the defendants, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, in the decree for rendition of accounts, on the ground that they are the de facto managers of the partnership business.

The account must begin with an ascertainment of the capital to the credit of Anandi Lal on the date of that gentleman's death. I do not think that the defendants, or any of them, should be held to be bound by the recital in the Will of Anandi Lal by which this capital is stated at Rs. 58,000. There is force in the contention raised by Ghasi Ram that this is no more than a rough estimate on Anandi Lal's part, and that it includes profits which Anandi Lal expected to make by the end of the year then current. The accounts will have to be examined up to the date of Anandi Lal's death and, amongst other things, the defendants should be permitted to prove, if they are able to do so, that Anandi Lal in his life-time gave directions for a sum of Rs. 5,000 to be contributed out of his share of partnership capital towards the construction of a dharamsala. The alleged agreement by which a further sum of Rs. 4,000 was to be contributed in equal shares by the two members of the partnership, to provide for the maintenance and expenses of the dharamsala must also be gone into. From the date of Anandi Lal's death, after the amount due to him as his share of partnership capital on that date has been ascertained, the accounts of all the shops carried on as part of the partnership business must be gone into, and the annual profits divided in the proportion of five-eighths assigned to the plaintiff and three-eighths to the defendants. The Court need not concern itself with the apportionment of this share of three-eigths as amongst the defendants, unless this point is expressly raised by the defendants, Nanag Ram and Ghasi Ram. If it should be so raised, I think our decree must leave it open to the Court below to exercise its discretion in the matter. In this settlement of accounts the profits of the shop carried on by Ram Dayal and Sham Lal in the building known as Mr. Campbell's kothi must be treated as part and parcel of the partnership profits and divided between the parties in the ratio already stated.

The defendants will be entitled to debit against the plaintiff, from year to year all money expended on his behalf, or for his benefit or for that of his mother. provided the expenditure be such as is warranted by the terms of Anandi Lal's Will. The money actually realised by the plaintiff's since he attained majority under the mortgage-decree already referred to must be brought into account as part payment of the amount due to him. I find it a little difficult to decide as to the proper directions to be given regarding certain items of immoveable property, referred to in detail in the course of the cross-examination of Ghasi Ram, which the plaintiff alleges to have been acquired out of partnership funds. I think our decree must leave it open to the plaintiff to raise this question and to the Court below to adjudicate upon it in such manner as it may determine to be just after the facts have been fully gone into.

Any money found due to the plaintiff must be recoverable, in the first itstance, out of the assets of the partnership business in the hands of the various defendants. I am not sure that we are called upon to provide for the contingency of such assets being found insufficient to meet the plaintff's claim. In case of such insufficiency Ghasi Ram, as a defaulting trustee, would certainly be liable to make it good. Nanag Ram, as the heir of another trustee, would also be liable to the extent of any monies which might have passed into his hands by reason of any breach of duty on his father's part. Ram Dayal and Sham Lal would not, I think, be liable, except to the extent of partnership funds in their hands.

In this connection, however, I think there is one point of considerable practical importance to be dealt with at once. On the admission of Sham Lal himself, these two defendants are in possession of a sum of from Rs. 47,000 to Rs. 48,000 which is due to the plaintiff and which they held to his credit. They represent it as coming out of the accumulated profits of the shop which they carried on for the benefit of the plaintiff in Mr. Campbell's kothi at Agra ; on our findings the money represents simply a portion of what is due to the plaintiff on a fair division of partnership assets. It is admittedly in the hands of these two defendants and I can see no reason why they should not be made to hand it over at once. Some time must yet pass before a final decree can be worked out on the basis of the decision at which we have arrived. It would be clearly unfair to the plaintiff that he should be left in difficulties for ready money while this large sum was lying to his credit in the hands of the two defendants. I think, therefore, that we ought to include in our decree a direction requiring them to fulfill their own undertaking by paying the money into Court within a period to be limited by the decree ; the said money to be taken into account hereafter in the final decree, in partial discharge of the plaintiff's claim and in liquidation of any sum which may be found due to the plaintiff from these particular defendants.

Walsh, J.—I have read my brother's judgment, and agree. There seems to me to be a great deal in the learned Subordinate Judge's interlocutory proceedings in the case, and in his final judgment, which is open to criticism. Once the conclusion is reached that the re-distribution of shares in the partnership sought to be effected by the deed of June 1901 was not executed by Anandi Lal, it stands as a piece of sheer robbery of the minor by Narain Das, of which his trusted karinda must have been cognisant, and colours the whole of the subsequent proceedings. For example, a point to which my brother has not referred, the assignment to the minor as part of his share, of the half kothi, for Rs. 6,500, the amount originally paid for the whole, and that without any pretence at a valuation, was a transaction which could not possibly stand in any view of the case, and was plainly a fraud upon the infant.

Subsequently to the death of Narain, the defendant, Ghasi, was the moving spirit in the business, and he has been throughout this suit the pillar of the defence. It is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, he was a witness unworthy of credit, and is contradicted by most of the other witnesses, against many of whom nothing can be suggested. He appears to have failed to grasp the essential difference between his duty as a trustee, and his interest as a partner, or if he realised it to have deliberately neglected the one for the benefit of the other, and then to have resorted to a method of defending his conduct, which is, unfortunately, only too common in these courts namely, that of setting up in Court the supposed consent of an ignorant and helpless mother to the abandonment of the legal rights of her still more helpless child. I am satisfied that even if the document had been satisfactorily established in fact by proof, the alleged dissolution was a sham, not understood by the trustees, except those who were to profit by it, and that it was not binding on the minor whose consent could only be lawfully given by them.

By the Court.—(1) First Appeal No. 347 of 1921 is dismissed with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

(2) In First Appeal No. 239 of 1920 we set aside the decree of the Court below, and in lieu thereof we decree the plaintiff's claim as follows.

(a) We grant him a preliminary decree for dissolution of partnership and rendition of accounts as against the defendants, Nanag Ram, Ghasiram, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal.

(b) There will be an ascertainment of the capital representing Anandi Lal's share in the partnership business on the date of that gentleman's death, subject to the directions given in the earlier part of the judgment of this Court.

(c) Thereafter, an account will be taken of the net profits which accrued year by year on each of the shops constituting the partnership business including the seven shops referred to in the Will of Narain Das and the shop started by the defendants, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, (ostensibly as a separate business for the benefit of the plaintiff alone) in the building known as Mr. Campbell's kothi in the City of Agra : in the profits thus ascertained the plaintiff's share will be ten-sixteenths and that of the defendants six-sixteenths. The Court will have discretion to apportion the shares of the defendants amongst themselves if they move it to do so.

(d) The Court will enquire whether any immoveable property now belongs to the partnership firm, or has been acquired out of partnership funds, and will pass such orders regarding the same as appear just.

(e) The defendants will be entitled to charge against the plaintiff all money expended on his behalf, or for his benefit or for that of his mother, provided the expenditure be such as is warranted by the terms of Anandi Lal's Will. They will also be allowed credit for the money realised by the plaintiff on the mortgage decree referred to in the earlier part of this judgment.

(f) Any money found due to the plaintiff will be recoverable, in the first instance, out of the assets of the partnership business in the hands of the defendants, Nanag Ram, Ghasi Ram, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal. In the event of the entire amount not being realised, the balance will be recoverable from Ghasi Ram personally and from Nanag Ram to the extent of any money which the Court may find to have passed into his hands by reason of any breach on the part of Narain Das of his duties as a trustee and executor under the Will of Anandi Lal.

3. The defendants, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal, will pay into Court within two months from the date of this decree, the sum of Rs. 47,500 to the credit of the plaintiff, who will be permitted to withdraw the same unconditionally. The defendants will be allowed credit for this payment against any sum found due to the plaintiff on the final settlement of accounts.

4. The suit as against the defendants, Mt. Pisto, Mt. Mohan Dei and Makhan Lal, will stand dismissed, but these defendants will bear their own costs.

5. The plaintiff will get his costs of this appeal against the defendants, Nanag Ram, Ghasi Ram, Ram Dayal and Sham Lal jointly and severally including fees of the higher scale. The Court below will pass suitable orders respecting all costs in that Court when it comes to pass its final decree.

6. The cross-objections of the defendant, Sham Lal, are dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed ;
Cross-objections dismissed.

Where the final decree contained no provision for payment of the balance and for the recovery of such balance from the debtor and the mortgagee was driven to make an application under O. 34, R. 6.

Held that the application under O. 34 R. 6 was in substance an application for a personal decree of the balance ascertained as a result of the realisation by the sale. Appeal from an order passed in that application is a regular appeal and ad-valorem court fee must be paid.

U. S. Bajpai—for Respondents.

Office Report.—The case out of which this appeal has arisen was not at all concerned with execution proceedings but with an application under O. 34, R. 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure praying for a simple money-decree for Rs. 874-10-5 in favour of the petitioners, Sita Ram Misir and Raj Ballan Misir. The Trial Court having allowed the petition ordered the decree to be prepared as prayed. Bindhiachal Rai and Mahendra Rai, opposite parties, then went in appeal to the lower Appellate Court but that Court, too, upholding the decree of the First Court dismissed the appeal. Thereupon the same gentlemen preferred this second appeal valuing it at Rs.874-10-5 but paying Court-fee of Rs. 2 only treating it as an execution second appeal. The facts given above clearly show that it cannot be treated as an execution second appeal but as a regular second appeal and Court-fee payable should be ad valorem on the amount claimed, Rs. 874-10-5, which comes to Rs. 66. In both the Appellate Courts, therefore, the Court-fee payable was Rs. 132 but annas eight having been paid in lower Appellate Court and Rs. 2 here, in all Rs. 2-8-0, there is a deficiency of Rs. 129-8-0 payable by appellants for this and for the lower Appellate Court.

Referring Order.

Ryves, J.—After the appeal was filed a note was made by the Taxing Officer of the Court that there was a deficiency in the Court-fees payable both in the lower Appellate Court and in this Court. This note was shown to the learned Counsel for the appellants and signed by him on the 13th of December 1922. The deficiency in the Court-fees payable to this Court was made good but on the matter being laid before Mr. Justice Daniels on the 10th of January 1923 the learned Counsel for the appellant stated that he would contest the alleged deficiency in the Court-fees paid in the lower Court at the hearing of the appeal. It seems to me that under rule 10 of the Rules of this Court of 18th January 1898 it is not open now to the learned Counsel to dispute the accuracy of the Taxing Officer's report. This matter seems to me of importance and as far as I know, has not been previously decided. I think it is of sufficient importance to lay before a Bench of two Judges. I direct accordingly.

Judgment.—We think that, having regard to the fact that the final decree of November 1915 contained no provision for payment of the balance and for the recovery of such balance from the debtor the mortgagee was driven to make an application under O. 34 R. 6. The position, no doubt, was a difficult one but we think that we ought to look at the substance, and an application under O. 34 r. 6, was in substance an application for a personal decree of the balance which had been ascertained as a result of the realisation by the sale. That amount could not be finally ascertained until the sale had been confirmed. The view that the Court below took on the matter of limitation, therefore, was right and the view that our Stamp Reporter took that this was a regular appeal was also right. The appeal is dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

We exempt the respondent from any liability under which he may otherwise be for payment of the deficiency in the Court below.

The Court below must do its best to recover the deficiency from the appellant.

Appeal dismissed.

S. A. No. 200 of 1922, Decided on 9th May 1923, from the decree of Addl J. Moradabad, D/-8th November 1921

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901) S. 63—Muafidars and sub-tenants.

In a suit by plaintiffs muafidars for ejectment the defendants pleaded acquisition of occupancy rights. It was found that defendants never paid any rent to plaintiffs, nor did they ever assert their title to the land to the knowledge of plaintiffs.

Held that the defendants were sub-tenants and liable to be ejected. [P 294 C 2]

K. C. Mital—for Appellants.

M. L. Agarwala—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for ejectment. The plaintiffs who are muafidars sued under S. 63 for the ejectment of the defendants as their tenants. The first written statement filed by the defendants was to the effect that the defendants had been in possession for more than 12 years and as the plaintiffs were muafidars the defendants had acquired occupancy rights and were occupancy tenants. This was on the 6th of January 1921. A supplementary written statement was filed on the 1st of April 1921 in which the defendants pleaded that they were zemindars and as the plaintiffs were muafidars they ought to have proceeded under S. 79 of Act No. 11 of 1901 and having failed to take any such steps for 14 years the suit was liable to dismissal. They further contended that the relationship of landlord and tenant did not subsist between the parties. The suit was brought in the Revenue Court and the Assistant Collector found that the relationship of landlord and tenant subsisted between the parties and that the suit was not barred by limitation. He also came to the conclusion that the defendants were sub-tenants of the plaintiffs and as they had never paid rent they could be only non-occupancy tenants and had not acquired any right of occupancy. On these findings the Assistant Collector decreed the claim. The defendants went up in appeal and the learned District Judge has found that the plaintiffs are muafidars khairati and could not be tenants in chief and therefore the defendants are not sub-tenants. The learned Judge has further found that the defendants having been in possession for more than 12 years without payment of rent had become occupancy tenants. On this finding he has dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs come here in second appeal and their first contention is that the defendants having been in possession without the consent of the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs were entitled to treat them as tenants under S. 34 and sue for their ejectment. So far as the plaint itself goes the suit has not been brought on these allegations. The learned Vakil for the appellants has referred me to a large number of rulings to show that the Board of Revenue has held that where a squatter has been in possession of a plot of land without the consent of the landlord his occupation for any number of 12 years would not vest him with the rights of an occupancy tenant, but that occupancy rights would commence to accrue only from the date the squatter commences to pay rent. This is evident from the last portion of S. 34 itself and does not require any ruling in support. The question however about which the Board itself is not consistent is when does the presumption arise that the possession of the tenant is without the consent of the landlord. In my opinion the decision of this question would depend upon the particular facts of each case and it is not a question capable of a uniform answer. It is obvious that S. 79 of the Tenancy Act has no application to the facts of this case because the plaintiffs are muafidars khairati and not tenants. It is also evident that the defendants, zemindars, could not have put in 12 years necessary for the acquisition of a right of occupancy because they have admittedly not paid rent. The defendants zemindars could not have acquired proprietary rights because there is nothing to show that they ever asserted a title adverse to the plaintiffs' the muafidars, to their knowledge. The plaintiffs have treated them as tenants by bringing this suit for their ejectment (see in this connection the case of Babu Sat Narain Prasad v. Ram Kumar, selected Decisions of the Board of Revenue, United Provinces, No. 3 of 1910 page 2.) The defendants being neither proprietors nor occupancy tenants ought to have been ejected and the decree of the first Court should not have been interfered with. I therefore allow, the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

K. N. Laghate—for Appellant.

Peary Lal Banerji — for Respondents.

Lindsay, J. — This was a suit for redemption, the appellant being the plaintiff. The principal defendant in the suit was one Desraj who was alleged to be the mortgagee.

According to the particulars set out in paragraph 2 of the plaint a mortgage was executed on the 3rd of June, 1890 by one Atbal Singh father of the plaintiff. The mortgage was in favour of the first defendant Desraj, the mortgage money was Rs. 2,100, and the mortgage was with possession.

The principal defence which was set up in the suit and which was accepted by a learned Judge in the Court below was that the deed upon which the plaintiff claimed a right of redemption, although it had been duly executed and registered, yet did not operate as a mortgage at all, inasmuch as the transaction was entirely fictitious. It was pleaded that this mortgage had been executed by Atbal Singh in favour of Desraj merely in order to defeat the claim for pre-emption which had been brought in respect of the property by one Gopal. It seems that on the very day on which Gopal filed his suit for pre-emption against one Kamta who was the first purchaser, Kamta sold the property to Atbal Singh, and three or four days after Atbal Singh executed the mortgage upon which the present suit is based.

In the Court below there seems to have been a good deal of discussion regarding the burden of proof with respect to the plea that the document of the 3rd of June, 1890, was a fictitious document.

The opinion of the Subordinate Judge was that the burden lay upon the plaintiff. In this matter we have no doubt that the Subordinate Judge was wrong. The execution and registration of the document having been admitted, if the defendant made the allegation that the document had been executed merely for show and was purely fictitious, the burden of proof rested upon him.

The pleaders of both parties declined to produce oral evidence in the case.

Certain facts were brought to notice and certain documents were before the Court which led the Subordinate Judge to the conclusion that on whichever of the parties lay the burden, it was established to his satisfaction that the mortgage was in fact fictitious transaction. He referred in particular to a pre-emption suit, suit No. 544 of 1890 in which the question of the genuineness of this deed of mortgage had been gone into by the Court. That was a suit in which Gopal the pre-emptor was a plaintiff and in which both Atbal Singh the mortgagor, and Desraj the mortgagee were impleaded as the defendants. It was certainly held in that case that the mortgage was a sham and had been entered into for the purpose of defeating Gopal's claim for pre-emption.

The Judge, however, was not right in saying that the judgment in this suit could be accepted as evidence of the facts stated therein. We do not mean to lay down that the judgment was altogether inadmissible, but we think it was not such a strong piece of evidence in favour of the defendant's case as the Subordinate Judge thought it to be.

And after all whatever importance we may attach to the finding in that suit regarding the fictitious character of this mortgage, we have the outstanding fact that subsequently Desraj himself professed to purchase the equity of redemption of this mortgage from one Khalaq Singh for a sum of Rs. 400. As a fact, however, Khalaq Singh was not the owner of the equity of redemption, nevertheless it is clear that Desraj had treated the mortgage as a genuine transaction.

It had been pointed out that Desraj did not go into the witness-box to sustain the plea which he raised by way of answer to the plaintiff's claim. The reason for this is apparent. There can be no doubt that in the pre-emption suit brought by Gopal Desraj had sworn to the genuine character of this mortgage. He was not, therefore, going to take the risk of prosecution for perjury by going into the witness-box in this case and swearing that the transaction was fictitious.

On the evidence as it stands we are satisfied that the plea raised by Desraj that this mortgage was a fictitious mortgage was not established.

We must, therefore, hold that the document is to be treated for the purposes of the suit as a genuine document of mortgage.

This brings us to another part of the case. In his plaint the plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to redemption without paying any sum. This plea was based upon the fact that certain proceedings had been taken on the plaintiff's behalf under the Bundelkhand Encumbered Estate's Act (Act I of 1903).

We have upon record the judgment and award of the Special Judge of Mahoba dealing apparently with the estate of the present plaintiff. This order is dated the 18th of December, 1905 (See Exhibit 7, page 23 of the printed record).

It is pleaded, therefore, that because proceedings were taken under this present Act, and because the judgment and the award were made as already indicated, all the debts on the estate of the plaintiff must be deemed to have been discharged, regard being had to the provisions of S. 12 of the Encumbered Estates Act.

The difficulty which we feel about this argument is that we have not before us the full record of the proceedings in the Court of the Special Judge. We observe from the order of the Special Judge that the application which was made under the Act on behalf of the plaintiff Chhiddu (who was at that time a minor) was made by one Jujhar Singh who, strangely enough, was acting in those very proceedings on behalf of his own father Gopal Singh who was one of the persons who was pressing his claims against Chhiddu's estate. This fact attracted the notice of the learned Judge, but he appears to have thought no harm to act upon the application, although it was made by a person apparently unauthorized.

We might, in the first instance, assume that proceedings were regularly taken under the Special Act, but the presumption must be overturned when we find it clearly stated that the person who was acting for the minor Chhiddu as his next friend was also acting in the same proceeding as the agent of one of the opposite parties.

In the circumstances we hold that these proceedings were not regularly taken, and that consequently, we are not in a position to conclude that this particular mortgage-debt with which we are now concerned became duly discharged under the provisions of S. 12 of the Special Act.

The result, therefore, is that the mortgage-deed is held to be a genuine document and the mortgage-debt is still outstanding.

We think the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for redemption, and we order accordingly. The appeal is allowed. The decree of the Court below is set aside, and it is ordered that a decree for redemption be drawn up in favour of the plaintiff. The plaintiff must pay Rs. 2,100. We give six months from the date of this decree for payment.

Having regard to all the circumstances, and in particular to the fact that the plaintiff has strongly pressed his case for redemption without payment of any sum, we think it proper to direct that the parties do bear their own costs both here and in the Court below.

The office will prepare a decree in terms of order 34 rule 7 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Appeal allowed.

Judgment. — Criminal Revision Nos. 526 and 527 have been put together and have been argued together but they involve absolutely distinct matters which must be carefully separated. What occurred was this Muhammad Yar Khan and others tenants of the village of Mahson in the Basti district instituted a complaint against Tarsu Beg, Rustam Bari and others on the allegations that Tarsu Beg, and Rustam Bari, who are servants of the Raja of Basti, attacked their village on a certain day and committed dacoity and arson. Tarsu Beg put in a cross-complaint under two heads. In the first place he stated that he had been assaulted and wrongfully confined by the complainants in the dacoity and arson case, and secondly he sought to prosecute the complainants in the dacoity and arson case for lodging a false complaint against him. Rustam Bari put in a cross-complaint in which he charged the complainants in the dacoity case with having illegally seized cattle belonging to the Raja, and added in the same way as Tarsu Beg had added, a complaint of a false charge.

The Magistrate who tried these cases found that the charges of dacoity and arson were not established and discharged the accused, but he refused to investigate the complaints of Tarsu Beg and Rustam Bari on the ground that they had not obtained saction under S. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in respect of the complaint as to the false charge. His orders were upheld by the Sessions Judge.

The law on the subject is this. No complaint, the institution of which requires sanction under S. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, can be entertained unless that sanction exists. But when a complainant combines such a complaint with a complaint which does not require sanction, the Court must investigate the complaint which does not require sanction while refusing to investigate the complaint which requires it. This is what the Magistrate failed to do. I set aside his order refusing to investigate Tarsu Beg's complaint that simple hurt had been caused to him and that he had been wrongfully confined while upholding his order refusing to entertain the remaining complaint. It appears that he directed an investigation under S. 202 but then refused to hear Tarsu Beg's witnessess. He will now continue the investigation under S. 202 and pass orders according to the law. I allow therefore Criminal Revision No. 526 to that extent. Revision No. 527 must however fail in entirety for although the same principles apply there is a defect in the complaint itself. Under the provisions of S. 20 Act I of 1871 the complaint should have been made within ten days of the alleged offence. It was not made till later. I therefore reject the Revision application No. 527.

Application No. 526 partly allowed.

Application No. 527 rejected.

Even after a decree has been passed upon a mortgage it is open to a judgment debtor to enter in the execution Court a pleading to the effect that something has taken place since the passing of the decree which amounts to a partial satisfaction of the decree. If such a plea be entered the execution Court is entitled and indeed is under a duty to enquire into the same and to continue the execution proceedings in respect of so much only of the decree which it finds after enquiry to be still unsatisfied. [P. 298 C. 2]

Durga Prasad—for Appellant.

N. P. Asthana—for Respondents.

Piggott, J.—The appellants Sahu Parshottam Saran has purchased at auction, in execution of a simple money decree, the interests of one Khalilur Rahman in village Karam Alipur. Khalilur Rahman mortgaged to the respondent Brahma Nand his rights in village Karam Alipur, along with a number of other properties, and Brahma Nand has obtained a decree upon the said mortgage which is now in process of execution. The share purchased by the appellant in village Karam Alipur having been put up to sale in execution of the mortgage decree, the said appellant filed an objection. The main point on which he apparently insisted in his petition of objection to the execution Court was that the decree-holder was bound to proceed against the various items of property involved in the mortgage decree in the order in which they were specified in the decree itself, that order being of course identical with the order followed in the specification given at the foot of the mortgage. There was no force whatever in this plea. It was rightly overruled in the Court below and it cannot be pressed in this Court. In the third paragraph of the petition of objection in the Court below, Sahu Parshottam Saran made a vague allegation, to the effect that the decree-holder was not acting in good faith in proceeding against the share in village Karam Alipur before taking any action against the mortgaged properties in two other villages, namely Miranpur and Shekhupur. He suggested that the decree-holder's action was in consequence of some bargain entered into between himself and the owners of the mortgaged properties in Miranpur and Shekhupur, the terms of which were being kept concealed from the Court. The decree-holder filed a written pleading, in the course of which he denied having entered into any bargain whatever with the owners of the properties in Miranpur and Shekhupur. He insisted that he was entitled to proceed against the mortgaged properties in such order as he might think best in his own interests. He entered certain other pleas intended to suggest the fact that the objector Sahu Parshottam Saran has made a very good bargain by his purchase of the Karam Alipur property and was intentionally obstructing the execution proceedings, in order to enjoy the usufruct of that prcperty for as long a period as possible. The execution Court has held that there was nothing in the pleadings before it upon which an issue of fact could be framed, that the decree-holder was clearly within his rights in proceeding against the property in village Karam Alipur, and that there was no force in the objection. In the petition of appeal to this Court an attempt is made to represent this case as one bearing some analogy with those cases in which the Courts have held that the integrity of a mortgage has been broken up by reason of the acquisition of a portion of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee himself. We were referred in argument to the decision of a Bench of this Court in the case of Sarju Kumar Mukerji v. Thakur Prasad (1). The learned Judge who decided that case obviously felt that they were applying a recognised principle of law to circumstances to which it had never previously been applied in any reported case. Their decision however amounts to no more than this. Even after a decree has been passed upon a mortgage it is open to a judgment-debtor to enter in the execution Court a pleading, to the effect that something has taken place since the passing of the decree which amounts to a partial satisfaction of the decree. If such a plea be entered, the execution Court is entitled, and indeed is under a duty, to enquire into the same and to continue the execution proceedings in respect of so much only of the decree which it finds after enquiry to be still unsatisfied. It seems to us quite impossible to read the vague and doubtful plea set up in the third paragraph of Sahu Parshottam Saran's petition of objection in the Court below as amounting to a plea that any portion of the decree had been in any manner satisfied. As it stands the plea amounts to no more than this, that the decree-holder had reasons of his own, which he has not disclosed to the Court, for taking action against the property in Karam Alipur before proceeding against the properties in Miranpur and Shekhupur. This plea cannot be brought within the purview of the principles laid down in the reported case above referred to, and we think the execution Court was quite right in brushing it aside. We dismiss this appeal with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

(a) Penal Code, S. 499—Public good.

If a person really is out-casted a statement to the members of the brotherhood that he was out-casted is for public good. So long as caste prevails, any attempt to minimise, ignore or brush on one side existing regulations, existing sanctions or respect for existing decisions must be regarded from the Indian point of view as contrary to the public good. (b) Civil P. C. S. 439—Findings of fact if perverse or contrary to law can be upset.

In the ordinary course of things findings of fact are accepted by a revisional Court as binding upon it but revision would be an idle farce if the revisional Court had not the power which has been exercised 100, possibly 1000, times throughout the High Courts in India to look into the evidence for itself and see if these findings can be justified by what appears upon the record A revisional Court does not decide the balance of credibility between two conflicting sets of witnesses or two conflicting issues of fact but it may be compelled to dissent from a finding of fact which is either perverse or has been arrived at contrary to well established principles of law. ✱ (c) Criminal Trial—Accused's conduct may affect his credibility but can't affect his right to compel prosecution to prove its case.

In a criminal case an accused person is not to be judged by how he pleads or fails to plead in the proceedings the precise and pedantic requirements of civil procedure. There is no such language as pleading in a criminal Court. The subsequent conduct or statement of an accused person may affect his credibility. It cannot destroy his right assuming him to be an innocent person until his guilt has been established without any reasonable doubt. [P 300 C 2]

M. L. Agarwala—for Applicant.

K. N. Katju—for Opposite Party.

Walsh, J.—This is an exceptionally difficult matter to know what to do with but I have come to a sort of rough conclusion which I think will conform to the procedure laid down by this Court in other cases, and, possibly in the end, be more satisfactory to both parties than the present state of things. One Uchhab Singh complained before a Special Magistrate, at Naini Tal, that he had been slandered by the accused Umed Singh by reason of a statement made by Umed Singh to the effect that Uchhab Singh had suffered the penalty of being out-casted by reason of his social relations with one Lachhi who himself was an outcaste. The matter had already assumed considerable proportions before it reached the Magistrate. Nothing else could account for the extremely elaborate judgment in which he has dealt with the matter, and although he describes it as a trifling matter (he is an Indian and ought to know better than I do, but I think that these caste questions in village communities are very far from being trifling matters) such an agitation was caused that 50 villages have been affected directly and 100 villages indirectly within a short time. It sounds more like the description of an incurable epidemic, and so serious has it become that marriage parties have been put under the ban. Yet says the Magistrate in his finding the allegation is false, and if that is so, it would seem to follow that the accused is a man of enormous influence, because it certainly is a startling thing that by the mere repetition of a false accusation which ought to be able to be proved or disproved by the brotherhood without much difficulty, he has nonetheless been able to affect 100 villages. The mere fact that 100 villages are affected for good or for evil, confirms me in my view that it is really a public question. I cannot help thinking that there is something out of the ordinary in this finding by the Magistrate. In the result, finding that the accused had uttered a false statement, which means of course false to his knowledge, and if defamatory, one of the worst turns which one man can do to another in the same society, the Magistrate sentenced him to the somewhat mild punishment of one month's simple imprisonment. The matter came before the learned Sessions Judge of Kumaun in revision. Dr. Katju, upholding in one sense the order of the learned Sessions Judge, while at the same time he asks me to ignore it and to hold that it was made without jurisdiction, because his only jurisdiction was to refer the question to this Court, has argued that the learned Judge had no right to go behind a finding of fact. I cannot agree with that statement framed in that bold way. In the ordinary course of things, findings of fact are accepted by a revisional Court as binding upon it, but revision would be an idle farce if the revisional Court had not the power, which has been exercised 100, possibly 1,000 times throughout the High Courts in India, to look into the evidence for itself and see if these findings can be justified by what appears upon the record. A revisional Court does not decide the balance of credibility between two conflicting sets of witnesses or two conflicting issues of fact, but it may be compelled to dissent from a finding of fact which is either perverse or has been arrived at contrary to well established principles of law. In this case, so far as the finding is concerned, it does seem that the learned Judge was abundantly justified. He says that it seems that in January Uchhab Singh was out-casted, and Dr. M. L. Agarwala for the applicants has drawn attention to a written panchayatnama signed by several of the brotherhood, by which the brotherhood decided that he was out-caste, and did it in January, whereas the statement complained of made by the accused, was not until March. But though the finding of fact by the Sessions Judge on this documentary evidence seems prima facie justified, it does not seem to have been arrived at according to law. The learned Judge did not issue notice, never heard the complainant, and having his attention drawn to this document assumed against the complainant that he had been out-caste, although in all human probability the only reason why the complainant brought the charge at all was to clear himself and stop these ugly statements being made about him. So that the order of the learned Judge, although in one sense in favour of the complainant, becomes an injustice, because it overrules the Magistrate on a fundamental issue of fact without giving the other side a chance of being heard. But, further, the order of the learned Sessions Judge meets with my strong disapproval on a totally different ground. In vulgar parlance he seems to have given each party a slap in the face. Turning to the accused the learned Judge has said that he did not plead justification before the Magistrate, and that, therefore, although the statement about the complainant having been out-casted might be true, he has nonetheless got to go to jail. A touch of humour is added by the fact that the accused has already gone to jail, has served the full term of imprisonment, and that what I am doing is really almost idle and superfluous. But I dissent totally from the proposition that in a criminal case an accused person is to be judged by how he pleads or fails to plead in the proceeding. Much injustice may be done by applying to criminal proceedings theprecise and pedantic requirements of civil procedure It is quite true that in dealing with defamation, the Penal Code has introduced a series of provisions adopted partly from the old common law in the nature of defences. but it has not altered the fundamental principle of the criminal law, that the complainant or prosecution must prove the accused to be guilty, or, in other words the absence of such facts as happen to bring the case within either of the defences or exceptions laid down in the section. There is no such language as pleadings in a criminal Court. The subsequent conduct or statement of an accused person may affect his credibility. It cannot destroy his right, assuming him to be an innocent person, until his guilt has been established without any reasonable doubt. The view of the learned Judge that the accused did not plead justification is in this case doubly fallacious, because in fact the Magistrate had framed an issue on that very question and had decided it adversely to the accused. But, in my opinion, the complainant was bound to prove that the statement was false, and further, that if it was true, it was not for the public good. What is for the public good is a question of fact, but until I am corrected I should hold that if a person really was out-casted, a statement to the members of the brotherhood that he was out-casted, was the kind of statement contemplated by the expression for the public good. So long as caste prevails, and it must be remembered that it is sanctified by religious and by racial tradition going back for centuries and forming one of the fundamental characteristics of social life in India, any attempt to minimise, ignore or brush on one side existing regulations, existing sanctions or respect for existing decisions, must be regarded from the Indian point of view as contrary to the public good. If it is not from the Indian point of view for the public good, caste ought to be abolished. It seems to me that there is no way out of that dilemma, and, therefore, to justfy this conviction it was necessary to hold, not merely that the statement was untrue, but that if, as the Sessions Judge thought, it was true that it was a statement not honestly made for the benefit of the brotherhood. Unfortunately that does not conclude the difficulties raised by this order of the Sessions Judge- Dr. Katju himself, who appeared for the complainant to defend it, while at the same time somewhat illogically asking me to ignore it, pointed out to me that it was passed without jurisdiction. Strictly speaking he is right. On the matter coming before the Sessions Judge under S. 435, his duty, if any question arose which he thought ought to be further dealt with, was to refer the matter to the High Court under S. 438. It may be said in answer to this that the learned Judge did not think that there was anything to refer, because ex parte he was so satisfied with the Magistrate's order. But the difficulty in taking that view is that, as I have pointed out, even the learned Judge has fallen into two fundamental errors, and one of them is a finding of fact adverse to the complainant without a hearing. My attention has been drawn to the important decision in the case of Sharif Ahmad v. Qubul Singh (1), also a case of defamation and a case having an important bearing on the case now before me, in which the Chief Justice has approved the following dicta of Mr. Justice Piggott :-

"It is obviously advisable that this Court should make it a rule of practice that a person dissatisfied with any order or proceeding in a Court of inferior jurisdiction to that of the Sessions Judge or of the District Magistrate, should, in the first instance, obtain the opinion of the Sessions Judge or of the District Magistrate on the matter in question, before invoking the jurisdiction of this Court. Such a procedure tends to prevent the time of this Court from being wasted over frivolous or unsustainable applications. It also ensures the further advantage that, if the matter eventually comes before this Court, it comes upon a record containing an expression of opinion by a Court of superior jurisdiction, such as that of the Sessions Judge or of the District Magistrate."

The value of that practice is of course entirely discounted if the opinion of the Sessions Judge therain mentioned, as desirable to be laid before the High Court, is arrived at by an ex parte finding. The result is that owing to a chapter of accidents I really am unable to come to a satisfactory conclusion in this case. One party wants me to quash the order, the other party wants me to ignore it. It struck me that I might deal with it by certain dicta and leave the accused in this case to repeat the slander and the complainant to fight it out with him in the Civil Court, where the matter can be finally and more satisfactorily determined, but that might be a hardship on the parties who possibly are not anxious to spend large sums on litigation, and as they have chosen this tribunal, I think it more satisfactory to ensure that they get a full adjudication in it. Holding myself, therefore, empowered to deal with it with a free hand, I allow the revision and I refer the whole matter back to the learned Judge to deal with the original revision application made to him by the accused according to law after hearing both parties and going into the evidence, and referring any question to the High Court which he thinks fit to do, if on a reconsideration of the matter he should come to the conclusion that the conviction of the accused was not according to law.

Panna Lal—for Applicant.

Baleshwari Prasad—for Opposite Parties.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a revision under S. 25 of the Provincial Insolvency Act from a decree of the Judge of Small Cause Court, Mainpuri, dismissing the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff's case in the plaint was that the defendants had executed a sale-deed of certain crops on the 9th of February, 1921, in his favour, that one Kirat Singh attached these crops and objection being preferred to the attachment by the plaintiff, the Execution Court dismissed his objection on the 13th of May, 1921; that after that the defendants took away the crops and also refused to return the sale-consideration; hence the suit.

In their written statement the defendants pleaded that the whole of the sale-consideration had not been paid. They also said that it was the plaintiff himself who had appropriated the crops and that no part of the crops came into the possession of the defendants; it was further pleaded that the attachment in favour of Kirat Singh had fallen to the ground for want of payment of expenses of the sale. The amount of the sale-consideration was also challenged, and, lastly, it was contended that the sale-deed had been found by a Court to be invalid and no suit on the basis of it was maintainable. Then there were general pleas that the plaintiff was not entitled to any money or relief. The learned Judge of the Court below has thrown out the suit on the preliminary ground that the objection having been dismissed on the 14th of May, 1921, and the present suit having been brought more than a year after that order, it was not maintainable. He relies on a ruling of this Court which has a bearing on Order 21, rule 63 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

There has been a gross irregularity in this case as there has really been no proper trial on the merits. Order 21 rule 63 is a bar to a subsequent suit instituted to establish the right which the plaintiff claimed to the property which was in dispute in the proceeding in which the objection was raised. It is manifest that in the present suit the plaintiff did not put forward any claim to the property which was then in dispute. He was suing for refund of sale-consideration and not possession of the property. Order 21 rule 63, therefore, had no application and nor has the ruling cited by the Court below. A case of this kind is not governed by one year's rule of limitation.

The learned Vakil who appears for the respondents sought to support the decree on a slightly different ground. His point was that the order of the 14th of May, 1921 was conclusive between the parties and that it is not now open to the present plaintiff to go behind the finding on which that order was based. That finding, according to his contention, means that the sale transaction was a fictitious one. This matter has not been gone into by the Court below and, therefore, I do not propose to go into it now in revision. I may, however, point out in passing that it is not quite clear whether the judgment-debtor was a party to the proceedings relating to the previous objection, that is to say, whether any notice had been issued to him and he had appeared in Court. It has been held in the case of Krishnasami Naidu v. Soma Sundaram Chettiar (1) that a judgment-debtor who is not in fact a party to the claim proceedings does not in the eye of law become such by reason solely of his being the judgment-debtor. Furthermore, according to the plea raised in the written statement, the attachment itself fell through because of non-payment of the expenses of sale. If the attachment was released, it is difficult to say why the objector should have been compelled to institute a suit to establish his right. As I have pointed out above, the case has not been decided by the Court below on the merits. It has simply thrown it out on the preliminary ground that it was brought more than a year after the order passed in the execution department. I accordingly allow the application, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the case to that Court for disposal according to law. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Application allowed.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the defendants arising out of a suit for possession and profits brought by the plaintiff-respondent. The plaintiff claims under a sale-deed in his favour by Johar made in the year 1912. The defendants deny the title of the plaintiff or his transferor and plead title in themselves and possession for more than 12 years. The First Court, in a careful judgment and after giving the parties the fullest opportunity of producing evidence, came to a conclusion adverse to the plaintiffs. I have read the whole of the order-sheet in the case very carefully, and I was led to do so because of the remark in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court that the suit was tried very purfunctorily by the Munsif and this led to the admission of the additional evidence in appeal. The lower Appellate Court examined two new witnesses and admitted three documents as additional evidence when the case was before it in appeal. There might be some excuse for examining the two witnesses, one of whom was the vendor of the plaintiff but there is absolutely no reason given by the Judge for admitting the additional documentary evidence. This admission of additional evidence, at least so far as the documents are concerned, is contrary to the provisions of O 41, r. 27 of the Code of Civil procedure and the admission of such additional evidence has certainly prejudiced the defendants who had got a decree in their favour from the Trial Court. This appeal should have been decided without the admission of additional evidence. As to the admission of oral evidence the only reason which the learned Judge gives for admitting it is that it was necessary to enable him to pronounce judgment, but as to the documentary evidence he does not give even this reason, if it is a reason at all. I think the findings of the lower Appellate Court are vitiated by the admission of additional evidence without sufficient reason, see the case of Hansraj v. Shiam Sunder (1). I. therefore, allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and send the case back to it for trial according to law after eliminating from its consideration the additional documentary evidence received by it in appeal. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Judgment.—This appeal by the defendant, Ram Kishen Rai, arises out of a suit for possession of a ¼th share in plot No. 590-I in the village of Kosara in the Ballia District in which the parties are permanent tenure-holders. The plaintiffs' title to a ⅛th share in this plot based by purchase is admitted. The dispute is as to the remaining ⅛th. In the plaint the plaintiffs simply set up their ownership of the plot and their unlawful dispossession by the defendant in June 1918. The case which they set up at the trial and which has been accepted by both the Court below is that they came into possession of the remaining ⅛th share under a private partition which took place 8 or 10, according to one witness, and 15 or 16 years ago, according to another. A private partition can be effected without any written document. In this Court the defendant's appeal is urged on two grounds neither of which was put forward in either of the Courts below and which this Court might, therefore, well refuse to entertain on this ground alone.

In support of the plaintiffs' case reliance was placed by the Courts below on an application for correction of papers filed in the revenue Courts in 1916 in which the defendant admitted that the plaintiffs were in possession of the area in suit by mutual arrangement and asked that the papers should be corrected accordingly to prevent future disputes. The proceedings for correction of papers were ultimately struck off for default but this fact is immaterial. It is the admission that is relied on. The plea put forward here is that this application is being relied on as a document of title and that as such it was inadmissible in evidence without registration. In fact, the document is not and does not purport to be a document of title, it is merely an admission of possession based on a previous arrangement between the parties and a request to the Court to give effect to that possession. In my opinion the ruling in Jagrani Misrain v. Besheshar Dube (1) on which the appellant relies does not apply. It is said that, apart from this document, there was no evidence of title but the judgment of the Trial Court which the learned District Judge has confirmed shows that this was not the case. The document was not relied on as a foundation of title but as an admission of it. The second plea is that the suit was barred by S. 32 of the Tenancy Act. S. 32 contains two sub-sections. The first declares that no division of a holding should be binding on the land-holder unless he consents. In this case the land-holder is not a party to the proceedings and no question of his consent was ever raised. The second sub-section forbids the Courts to entertain a suit for the division of a holding. It has, however, been held in Kelar v. Deo Narain (2) that this section does not apply to a suit to recover a fractional share in a holding against a person in lawful possession. For these reasons the appeal, in my opinion, fails and I accordingly dismiss it with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Pre-emption—Who can pre-empt.

Where a person purchased a plot of land situated within a share in a village.

S. N. Sen—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.—The facts of this case may be briefly stated as follows :—On the 17th January 1919, one Panna Lal, who owned a one-anna six pies share, sold a plot comprised in that share, namely, plot No. 177 together with two trees to Sahdeo and others, defendants.

On the 20th September 1919, Panna Lal sold his entire 1 anna and 6 pies share to the same persons.

A suit for pre-emption was brought by the plaintiff-appellant, Ram Gobind Pande for the purpose of pre-empting both these sales.

It has been held by both Courts below that the plaintiff cannot pre-empt the first sale, that is to say, the sale of the isolated plot, on the ground that he had notice of the sale and had an opportunity of exercising his right to pre empt which he refused to avail himself of. It must be taken, therefore, for the purposes of the present decision that the first sale is not liable to pre-emption.

The question, therefore, remains whether the plaintiff is entitled to succeed in his suit for pre-emption so far as it concerns the sale of the 1 anna 6 pies share which, as we have said, was carried out on the 20th September 1919. The finding of the Court below is that the suit must fail on the ground that the vendees had already become co-sharers in the village by reason of their having purchased the plot No. 177 under the sale-deed executed on the 17th January 1919.

It has been strongly contended here that this purchase did not give the vendees the status of co-sharers in the village (hisse daran mauza), to quote the words of the wajib-ul-arz.

There is a great deal of case law in the decisions of this Court regarding the position of persons who have purchased isolated plots of land and the question has arisen again and again for decision whether or not the purchasers of such plots are for the purposes of pre-emption to be deemed co-sharers in the village. The cases fall into different categories which depend upon the nature of the land which is purchased. We have, for example, cases of purchases of plots of muafi land not assessed to revenue. Again we have other cases known as arazi duri; cases where sales have been made of certain isolated plots of land which are assessed to revenue but which nevertheless are outside the mahal.

And, lastly, we have cases like the present where a plot sold is within the mahal and forms a portion o a defined share in the village, that is to say, a defined area of land forming part of a definite share assessed to revenue.

This latter class of cases has been dealt with in a series of decisions beginning with the Full Bench decision of the Court in Safdar Ali v. Dost Muhammad (1). In that case it was held that where a person purchased a plot of land situated within a share in a village, he was to be deemed a co-sharer in the village and it was held in the case reported in Dakhni Din v. Rahim-un-nissa (2) that such a person would be treated as a co-sharer in the village even though his name did not appear in the revenue papers.

Another case on this point is to be found in Ali Husain Khan v. Tassaduk Husain Khan (3). That case is, so far as we can see, on the same footing as the case with which we are now concerned. It is not necessary for us to refer to the decisions on the other classes of cases for clearly they would not be applicable in the present instance. Here we are dealing with a plot of land comprised in a 1 anna 6 pies share which is assessed separately to revenue, and which is recorded separately in the khewat. That being so, the case falls within the principle laid down in Ali Husain Khan v. Tassaduq Husain Khan (3). It is true that there have been other decisions of this Court which seem to point in a contrary direction. One of these to which we have been referred is to be found in 15 I. C. 251. But there the facts are not fully set out and it is impossible to gather from the language of the report what was the particular nature of the plots in question in that case.

We are satisfied, therefore, with the decision of the Court below in this particular case that the vendees who purchased this plot No. 177 on the 17th January, 1919, were entitled to claim the status of hissadaran mauza, and that being so, we hold that the suit of the plaintiff was rightly dismissed. The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mushtaq Ahmad—for Applicants.

Judgment.—This is an application in revision. The first point taken is that the learned District Magistrate has under an oversight rejected the application filed before him summarily and has not considered the case on the merits. It is conceded that no appeal lay to him.

However I have heard the learned vakil for the applicants and have also examined the grounds on which the judgment of the trial Court is sought to be set aside Two points have been urged. The first is that the prosecution evidence has not been thoroughly discussed. I cannot accept this. The judgment of the trying Magistrate, who tried the case summarily, covers more than a page in type. He has referred to the four witnesses who had seen the occurrence, and after stating what they opposed to, has come to the conclusion that they should be believed. On the finding recorded by him the accused went about canvassing and on a refusal by the complainant to vote for him struck him with a lathi and two of his companions, the co-accused, beat him with hands. This case has been proved according to the trying Magistrate against him. In my opinion the finding on that point is clear and cannot be interfered with.

The next point urged is that the order binding them over under S. 106 was improper inasmuch as there was no express finding that there was an apprehension of a breach of the peace. Reliance is placed on a case reported in 43 Cal., 586. That case however is clearly distinguishable because there the conviction was neither for riot nor for assault-and before proceeding under S. 106 the Court had to be satisfied that the offence was one which involved a breach of the peace, or of abetting the same. In the present case the accused were convicted of an offence of assault. In any case the learned Magistrate has also expressed an opinion to the effect "that the accused persons appear to be very troublesome." I am of opinion that there is no legal flaw in the judgment. The case was a very simple one, and the accused were bound over because of the feelings which may be created in an election campaign. I am satisfied that the Magistrate must have thouget it necessary to bind them over. The application is without force and I dismiss it.

N. P. Aspthana—for Appellant.

Zafar Mehdi—for Respondent.

Mukerji, J.—The facts which have given rise to this appeal are these. There were two decrees one No. 15 of 1912, in favour of one Parsidh Narain and against the judgment-debtor Muhammad Matin. There was another decree No 95 of 1912, in favour of Abdul Shakur against the same judgment debtor Muhammad Matin. The decree No. 95 of 1912 ordered the sale of some property which was included in the decree No. 15 of 1912. In fact the decree No. 15 of 1912 was passed on an earlier mortgage. The two decrees were put into execution and, the property involved being ancestral, they were sent to the Collector for execution. The subsequent mortgagee Abdul Shakur satisfied the earlier decree No 15 of 1912, on 18th of September 1914. He then asked the Subordinate Judge that the amount of the prior decree should be added to the amount due under his own decree, namely, decree No. 15 of 1912. The learned Subordinate Judge, by order dated 3rd July 1915, found that this could not be done but he suggested that Abdul Shakur might proceed under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, Schedule I, Order 34, rules 12 and 13. Thereafter the decree No. 95 of 1912, was again sent to the Collector for execution by order, dated 22nd June 1916. When execution was proceeding before the Collector, Abdul Shakur made an application to the Subordinate Judge on 30th January 1917, asking that the Collector might be informed that the sum of Rs. 2,075 which had been paid by him to Parsidh Narain for the satisfaction of decree No. 15 of 1912, should also be realised and the property sold, not subject to the mortgage created in favour of Parsidh Narain, but free from incumbrance. This application he was competent to make under the provisions of law already quoted, namely, Order 34, rules 12 and 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The learned Subordinate Judge acceded to this request and ordered that the application of Abdul Shakur might be sent to the Collector for his information. The property was sold on 20th August, 1918, and was purchased by Abdul Shakur. He gave a receipt, a copy of which is on the record. He thought that the point should be made clear that the property had been sold free from encumbrance and that the amonnt of money for which he bad purchased was to be credited first towards the decretal amount due under the decree No. 15 of 1912 and the balance should go to satisfy his own decree. His application to the Collector and his appeal to the Commissioner were unsuccessful. Subsequently he made an application before the Subordinate Judge for recovery of what was due to him under his decree. He gave credit for the money realised by the Collector towards the satisfaction of the prior decree and the balance applied towards part payment of his own decree. Objections were raised as to his execution with the result that this second appeal comes before us.

The learned District Judge held that the orders of the Collector and the Commissioner stood in the way of the decree-holder getting his money. He found that Collector and the Commissioner were the executing Courts and that. they having decided that the only decree that was executed was the decree No. 95 of 1912 nothing further could be done in the matter.

The contention that has been raised by the learned Counsel for the decree-holder before us is this. The Collector was to find out the best method of raising money in order to satisfy the decree passed by the Civil Court. He had absolute jurisdiction to choose the best method allowed to him by the law but beyond that it was not within his province to decide how much money was due to the decree-holder and how much of the decree had been satisfied. In support of this proposition of law the learned Counsel has quoted two cases, namely, Tapesri Lal v. Deokinandan Rai (1) and Bhurchand Hansraj v. Vira Champa (2). Both these cases support his contention. Any comment of the decree-holder could not give the Collector any jurisdiction which he did not possess under the law. One important fact which must not be lost sight of is this. No rights of any third party are involved. It was the decree-holder who was prepared to forego his rights as a prior mortgagee which he acquired by payment of the decree passed in favour of Parsidh Narain. He unequivocally declared that he was not going to rely on any prior mortgage. The judgment-debtor was there and orders were passed in the case and it must be taken that he was all along aware of the same. No attempt has been made to show that the procedure of the learned Subordinate Judge has in any way prejudiced him. In the circumstances it appears to us to be clear that the three properties which were sold on 20th August 1918, were sold free from the encumbrance created in favour of Parsidh Narain and the money that was realised must be credited first towards the satisfaction of Parsidh Narain's decree and the balance should go towards the part payment of the decree No. 95 of 1912.

It remains to notice the receipt which was given by Abdul Shakur on his purchase. As the learned District Judge has remarked that receipt does not say that Abdul Shakur bought the property in full satisfaction of his decree No. 95 of 1912 and in execution of no other decree. The property that was sold could be sold free from encumbrance with the consent of Abdul Shakur. The receipt does not say that Abdul Shakur purchased the property subject to the mortgage in his own favour.

The result is that we allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the execution case through the lower appellate Court to the first Court for disposal according to law. Costs of this appeal and the appeal in the Court below must be paid by the judgment-debtor-respondent. Costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Iqbal Ahmad, S. N. Mukerji and S. P. Sinha—for Appellant.

S. N. Chaube—for Respondents.

Piggott, J.—This was a suit by two Hindu sons to contest an alienation of joint family property made by way of sale on the 14th of October 1919, by their father in favour of Bhim Singh, who is now the appellant before us. It has been found that the consideration for the sale consisted of the satisfaction of two older debts. One of these was incurred under a mortgage of December 5th, 1904, and the other under a mortgage of the 19th July 1910. On the bond of 1904 a suit has been brought and a decree passed. The satisfaction of this decree formed the major part of the consideration for the sale in suit. The satisfaction of the mortgage of 1910 constituted the remainder of the consideration. Both these mortgages had been contracted by the father of the plaintiffs. In the plaint the transactions were challenged on the ground that these older debts, incurred in the years 1904 and 1910, were for immoral purposes and, therefore, not binding upon the sons. This point was found against the plaintiffs. Nevertheless the lower appellate Court and the learned Judge of this Court who heard the case in second appeal, having regard to the principles which have been deduced by this Court from the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1), held that the older mortgages of 1904 and 1910 could not in themselves constitute an antecedent debt for the discharge of which the father could alienate a portion of the joint family estate It was not proved to the satisfaction of the lower appellate Court that these older mortgages had themselves been executed for lawful necessity and, consequently the suit brought by the sons was decreed. Since the decision of the learned Judge of this Court their Lordships of the Privy Council have reviewed the entire question in the case of Brij Narain Rai v. Mangal Prasad (2). We have no doubt that on the principles laid down in that decision the older mortgage of 1910 and the decree passed upon the mortgage of 1904 constitute antecendent debts, being, as their Lordships have put it, antecedent in fact as well as in time. They were wholly independent of the transaction now impeached, namely, the sale of October 14, 1919, and were in no sense parts of that transaction. It was, therefore, within the competence of the father of the plaintiffs to alienate a portion of the joint family property in satisfaction of these antecedent debts of his own, so long as those debts had not been incurred for an immoral purpose. This appeal must, therefore, succeed. We set aside the decree of the learned Judge of this Court and also that of the lower appellate Court. We restore the decree of the Court of first instance dismissing the plaintiffs' suit. The defendant is entitled to his costs throughout, including fees on the higher scale in respect of both hearings in this Court.

Out of inconsistent and contradictory judgments inter parties, the later judgment must prevail. Prior decree becomes unenforceable after later decree, but where later decree does not cancel prior decree the fruits got in execution of prior decree are not restored to the judgment-debtor in the prior decree, who was held entitled to prevent further execution only by a still later decision in his favour, on his filing a suit for the purpose.

K. N. Katju—for Appellant.

J. B. Lal—for Respondents.

Walsh, J.—This is a matter which is perfectly simple and straightforward, but which by a combination of circumstances has got into a slight tangle. The whole question turns upon the interpretation of a will, about which unfortunately there has been a difference of opinion. But that question was finally and conclusively determined against the parties to this suit by a judgment of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Banerji, on the 5th of December, 1919. In order to simplify this judgment, we propose to call the parties merely appellant and respondents. The appellant and respondents to this appeal were entitled by a will of an ancestor dated the 10th of April, 1882, to a half share of a business. A controversy has arisen ever the meaning of the will as to the house. The respondent brought a suit against the appellant to determine that question. It reached the High Court in second appeal and every Court was against the appellant, and it was decided by a single Judge of this Court, in May, 1916, that the house belonged to the parties in equal shares, half and half. That decision was final and binding upon the parties for the time being. But when the respondent, who had been successful in that suit, started to enforce his rights in the execution Court, the usual tertium quid appeared upon the scene in the character of a separated member of the joint family to which the appellant had belonged, and he claimed unsuccessfully in the execution Court his half share in this property which had been joint and had been partitioned to him. That was a sort of jus tertii independently of any decision in the previous litigation. If he was right, the decree in the previous litigation could only operate upon the balance which was left after his rights had been separated and given to him. Thereupon he brought a suit claiming his share of which he had been deprived in the execution Court, and he made both the appellant and the respondent parties to that suit. In that suit the interpretation of the will undoubtedly came substantially into question. The suit could not be decided without interpreting the will, and as you cannot interpret half a document, it necessarily followed that the interpretation adopted in that suit would not only affect the rights of Sheo Prasad but also the rights inter se of the appellant and respondents who were then co-defendants. So that as regards the interpretation of the will, the following principle of law, which nobody is concerned to dispute, came into play. As regards co-defendants, adjudication which is necessary to give the proper relief to the plaintiff, is res judicata as between the co-defendants as well, provided there is a conflict of interest. In the end that suit also reached the High Court and Mr. Justice Ryves, before whom the appeal in second appeal came, was of opinion that the interpretation of the will in the previous suit on appeal was erroneous. He referred it to two Judges. It ultimately came before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Banerji who in the decree we have already referred to, dated the 5th December, 1919, held that the previous interpretation of the will was erroneous and that the house had been bequeathed to the appellan solely, the result of which was that the plaintiff in that suit was entitled to his share and the appellant to what was left. It was not necessary on that occasion to go into the consequences of the decree which was passed. It was a matter which might be left, if the Court thought fit, to be dealt by arrangement between the parties themselves, or by any other Court which might have to interpret the effect of that decree. The High Court might on that occasion have given a declaration as between the two co-defendants as to their rights. It had in fact expressed those rights in so many words. It was not asked to do more. The parties were left to their existing rights. Those rights are not difficult to state. From the 5th December the appellant had his half share. Sheo Prashad had his half share. The respondent was out in the cold. But inasmuch as the decree of the High Court of 1916 was not affected by the decree of the High Court of 1919, it remained pro tanto good and anything done under it was pro tanto valid. Something had been done under it. The respondent had not slept upon his rights. He had done his best to enforce them as the result of his triumphant but temporary success in 1916 and he brought one suit for rent in 1917 which ended in a compromise, and even after December, 1919 he applied to the execution Court, namely, in March, 1921, to execute his decree, which, although he never ought to have obtained in the light of what the High Court had subsequently held, he still enjoyed as the result of the 1916 decision. The Subordinate judge who dealt with that execution proceeding took a perfectly right course. It was pointed out to him by the appellant before us that there was a subsequent decision which showed that the respondent ought not to have recovered that decree. He declined to fall into the trap which was laid for him. His business was to execute the decree and to decide any legal grounds which might be raised in objection to its execution, and although in giving his reasons he indulged in certain dicta, which is the way of Judges who are unfortunately expected, even if not compelled, to give reasons for what they do, dicta which, we are bound to say, we should probably have expressed ourselves as one of our reasons for the order with reference to the state of things created by the decision of the High Court. In substance he expressed that the prior decision of the High Court was res judicata and binding upon the parties, and Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal, on behalf of the present respondents, relies upon these dicta as amounting in themselves to res judicata binding upon the appellant before us. He might have appealed from the order of the execution Court. He did not. Therefore, says Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal, everything which the Judge said in his judgment is binding upon the appellant for ever. But of course that is not so. The question of whether the previous proceedings were res judicata between the parties was not either directly or substantially in issue in the execution Court. The later decision of the High Court differing from the prior decision, as we have already pointed out, left the existing decrees untouched. The execution Court had to execute such decrees in accordance with the law without regard to what any Judge might have said or done in some other suit which was not before it. But in the light of this somewhat incongruous state of things, namely, that a party who had been declared by the High Court to have no interest whatever in the property was still successfully executing decrees which gave him the profits thereof, it is not surprising that the appellant looked round to see how he could right the wrong, which it undoubtedly was, and he brought the present suit. For the moment we will pass by the criticisms which the respondent's counsel Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal has based upon the form of the relief claimed. The substance of the matter is a suit to declare in his favour as against the respondents, with reference to this much debated point, the rights which had been established in his favour by the subsequent decision of the High Court, and he started upon that suit undoubtedly with the object of enforcing in his favour that decision and of doing so by means of the principle of res judicata which in his view under S. 11 of the Code made the decision of the 5th of December, 1919 binding upon the respondents. In the decision of that question, which was really the only question in suit, the lower Courts have gone off the line. The question substantially and directly in issue in the prior litigation which ended in the decree of December, 1919, was, what were the rights of the parties in respect of the house under the will? The absence of Sheo Prasad from the first suit, and the fact that the second suit only related to half the house, are both irrelevant. The greater includes the less, and a decision as to the whole house ofcourse includes a decision as to the half, and it was impossible to decide the issue in Sheo Prasad's suit which ended in the decree of December, 1919, without deciding the rights over the whole house. We come without hesitation to the conclusion that the decision with regard to the interpretation of the will, and, therefore, the devolution of the whole house, was substantially and directly in issue between the appellant and respondents as co-defendants in Sheo Prasad's uit within the meaning of S. 11. and hat, therefore, both the lower Courts have come to a wrong decision, and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed in this appeal and substantially in the suit. We now come to the que tion as to the form of the relief. Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal with regard to this has taken a good point. The plaintiff claims that the decree in No 455 of 1914 which has been wrongly passed may be cancelled. Putting this into plain English, it is asking the Munsif to cancel a decree of a Single Judge of the High Court which, as we have already said, is dangerously near to contempt of Court, and it is clear that the Munsif was not disposed to do it. Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal for the respondents now contends that he has not decided the issue at all But in asking for this relief the plaintiff either by good luck or judgment happens to have put in the necessary words which entitle us to do justice in the case. He says that under the will dated the 10th of April 1882, the defendants have got no right in the house known as Arhatwala. That is really what he was trying to do, namely, to establish that the decree of the 5th of December, 1919 was binding upon the respondents, that the respondents had no right to the house, and that therefore he, the plaintiff, was entitled to a declaration that he was, and the fact that he put in an ancillary claim which it was impossible for the Court to grant. does not in our view disentitle him to what is obviously just and right in the circumstances as they now exist. Though it may be useless, we think it right to indicate to the parties our view of how matters should for good and all rest between them. The respondents are clearly entitled, in our opinion, to the fruits of what they have been able to recover as the result of the decision in their favour in 1916 without qualification. That is to say, as regards any decision in execution proceedings taken even after the 5th of December, 1919, the status quo is to continue. On the other hand, as the result of this decision, the plaintiff is not entitled in law to restitution of anything which he may have paid in the meantime. But as from today the decree of 1916 and any proceedings in the lower or execution Courts based thereon must be regarded as at an end, Mr. Jang Bahadur Lal has very naturally pressed upon us on behalf of his clients that we ought to remit the case for the determination of other issues. Technically he possesses this right, but we have gone into the matter very thoroughly and we are convinced that no further issue remains to be determined. Furthermore there was an agreement between the gentlemen conducting the case on either side in the Munsif's Court that no oral evidence should be produced. This creates an estoppel. The appeal must be allowed and the plaintiff's suit decreed in the terms of this judgment with costs here and below.

Appeal allowed.

E. S. A. No. 1268 of 1922, Decided on 7th January 1924, from the decision of D. J. Allahabad.

Civil P. C., S. 47—Party.

Where mortgage decree against two persons is set aside against one in appeal objection by successful defendant that judgment debtor had no interest in property sought to be sold must be tried in execution proceedings as the successful defendant is a party. [P 313 C 2]

Damodar Das—for Appellant.

Haribans Sahai—for Respondent.

Stuart. J.—The litigation which has resulted in this appeal has taken a most unfortunate course. A woman called Mahadei, the widow of a Halwai called Mahadeo, on the death of her first husband married a certain Chunni Lal. Second marriages are permitted amongst Halwais. Mahadeo had owned two houses. On the 26th February 1907, a mortgage was executed for consideration in favour of Mahant Ishar Das by which these two houses were hypothecated. Ishar Das successor-in-interest filed a suit upon this mortgage against Mahadei and Chunni Lal. The suit was decreed against both of them. Mahadei alone appealed. The District Judge found in appeal that there was an irregularity in the execution of the mortgage which vitiated it against both executants but as Chunni Lal had not appealed, he allowed Mahadei's appeal only. It is quite clear that the effect of his judgment was in no way to absolve Chunni Lal from liability and that the preliminary decree remained a good decree as against Chunni Lal. The decree as it stood was against Chunni Lal personally with a lien declared upon the two houses but a final decree was subsequently prepared against Chunni Lal only ordering the sale of the two houses. This decree as it stands does not affect Mahadei in any way. She is not named in it and to read the decree it can only mean that Chunni Lal's interests in the two houses are to be brought to sale That is all that a mortgage decree can mean. It is passed against property standing in the name of a particular person and implies that the interests of that particular person in the specified property are brought to sale. When this decree was put into execution for the sale of the two houses Mahadei put in an objection in which she stated that the houses in question did not belong to Chunni Lal but belonged to her and that they should not be sold by auction. She continued that if they were sold at auction it should be proclaimed at the time of the sale that she owned these two houses and that Chunni Lal had no right, title or interest therein. This objection appears to us not to be in any way an ojection impugning the decree but an objection setting forth a desire to explain the decree. Mahadei was undoubtedly a party to the suit in which the decree was passed under the explanation to S. 47, C. P. C., and the question that she raised was clearly to our mind a question relating to the satisfaction of the decree. So S. 47 is applicable to the matter and Mahadei's objection should have been decided upon the merits as was ordered by the late Mr Shibendra Nath Banerji, on the 7th November 1921. We cannot agree with the views taken by the late Mr. Benerji's successor and by the District Judge. We hear that in the meanwhile Mahadei has filed a suit for a declaration to the same effect, that she has succeeded in this suit and that the suit is now pending before the District Judge in appeal. The fact that she has done so renders the remainder of the proceedings somewhat academic. It is absolutely clear that what must be decided is to whom these houses belong and whether the question is decided under S. 47 or by a regular suit appears to us not very material in the circumstances of the case. What appears to be desired is a correct decision and what seems to be less important is the method of arriving at it. Fortunately the law now meets any difficulty in this matter for a proceeding under S. 47 can be treated as a suit and a suit can be treated as a proceeding under S. 47

We, accordingly, remit the matter to the learned District Judge for decision according to law. He will be seised both with the appeal in the regular suit and this present objection. Costs here and hitherto will abide the result.

Appeal allowed.

Cr. Rev. No. 681 of 1923, Decided on 13th December 1923, from an order of Ss. J. Allahabad.

Companies Act, S. 282—Contravention.

Prospectus was sent to Registrar showing 5 Directors. Though 2 Directors out of them had not paid their share money accused stated that every Director had paid it.

Held though registrar could have detected it before permitting commencement of business, accused came within S. 282. [P 314 C 2]

P. L. Banerji—for Applicant.

Mears, C. J.—I am of opinion that this application in revision must be rejected. The facts are very simple. In November, 1919, Mr. Bose sent a prospectus to the Registrar, Joint Stock Companies, a memorandum and articles of association and from those documents it appeared that five persons consented to be Directors of the Company, and as such had undertaken to take up 500 shares of Rs. 10 each. Three of those persons subsequently did discharge their obligations but Raja Ram Gopal Singh of Manda and Goshain Rampuri never paid any sums due from them and beyond the fact that their names were given out as Directors of the Company, they did nothing whatever. On the 10th of September, 1920, nearly a year after, Mr. Bose made a declaration, as required by statute, to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, with the object of inducing the Registrar to grant permission to allow the Company to commence business. In that declaration he stated: "Every Director of the Company has paid to the Company on each of the shares taken or contracted to be taken by him, and for which he is liable to pay in cash a proportion equal to the proportion payable on application and allotment on the shares offered for public subscription. The only information that the Registrar had of the persons who were described as Directors was that there were five persons including the Raja of Manda and Goshain Rampuri; that is to say, had he attempted to ascertain what was meant by the phrase "every Director" and had turned to the list of Directors, furnished by Mr. Bose, he would have seen five names. It is suggested that if he had turned to another document where in shares were allotted he would have seen that in point of fact a period of two months had expired without the Raja of Manda and Goshain Rampuri having paid their dues as Directors, and, therefore, by a process of reasoning and by applying some knowledge of law he would have been able to decide for himself that the Directors had dropped from 5 to 3. I am of opinion that the Registrar was under no duty of that character, that he was entitled to assume that the five Directors, whose names had been given to him by Mr. Bose, were intended to be and were in fact included in the words "every Director" entered in the declaration given in September; and if anything had happened in the interval between November 1919 and September 1920 to reduce the number of Directors, it was the duty of Mr. Bose to tell that to the Registrar as one of the material facts to be taken into consideration by him in deciding whether this Company should be allowed to commence business. His omission to make this clear to the Registrar brought him in the opinion of the Joint Magistrate and in the opinion of the Sessions Judge within S. 282 of the Act, and also in my opinion.

It is said that six months' rigorous imprisonment is too severe a sentence in the circumstances, I do not agree with that view. It is of the utmost importance that in a country such as this, where everybody hopes that there will be a very great extension of industrial prosperity, and that industrial prosperity probably conducted along the lines of Limited Companies, that the persons who embark on Company floatation, and who assume offices of responsibility, should understand that they have got to carry out their duties not only carefully but honestly. I accept the conclusion that the Sessions Judge has come to; and, as I said at the outset, this application in revision must be and is rejected.

Application rejected.

A suit was brought by two persons who alleged themselves to be the presumptive reversioners of G. who died sometime ago and was succeeded by his widow. On the 7th of February 1914 the widow executed a gift by which she purported to transfer the entire estate left by her husband in favour of J. a third presumptive reversioner. Plaintiffs prayed for a declaration of the invalidity of the deed of gift as against them after the death of the executant, the widow. While G. was still alive two usufructuary mortgages were executed by his mother in favour of certain mortgagees One of these mortgage was in favour of a number of persons including the plaintiffs. After the deed of gift was executed in favour of J. he redeemed his mortgage from plaintiffs.

Held: that plaintiffs should be granted the declaration but that in the event of the present plaintiffs surviving the widow, they will only be entitled to actual possession of their share of the property which was mortgaged, on payment to J. or his legal representatives, their quota of the mortgage debt. 23 W.R. 409 P.C. Haribans Sahai—for Respondents.

Judgment.—We think that on the main question decided in the Court below the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is correct. The suit was a suit brought by two persons Jesri Singh and Tulshi Singh who alleged themselves to be the presumptive reversioners of one Gaya Din Singh who died some time ago and was succeeded by his widow Mt. Sonkali.

On the 7th of February 1914 Mt. Sonkali, the widow of Gaya Din, executed a gift by which she purported to transfer the entire estate left by her husband in favour of Jagannath Singh who is also one of the presumptive reversioners.

Jagannath Singh was impleaded in this litigation as defendant No. 1. He has since died and is now represented by his descendants.

The case for the plaintiffs was that this deed of gift was an invalid document and they prayed for a declaration of its invalidity as against them after the death of the executant Mt. Sonkali.

Jagannath Singh and certain other reversioners who were impleaded as defendants put up the defence that this deed had been executed with the consent of the plaintiffs. Some of the defendants who are reversioners gave evidence to this effect but the learned Judge of the Court below has refused to believe them and we think, having regard to all the circumstances, that he was perfectly right. The document itself does not refer to any consent given by the other reversioners. On the contrary the gift purports to have been made by Mt. Sonkali in favour of Jagannath in consideration of services which Jagannath Singh had rendered to her. We have already adverted to the fact that the gift comprised the entire estate which was left by Mt. Sonkali's husband.

One of the plaintiffs Jesri Singh died while the suit was pending. The other plaintiff his brother Tulshi Singh, gave evidence in the case and denied that he had ever given any consent to the execution of this deed of gift. We may also mention another circumstance which is of some importance. In the year 1916, some other reversioners one of whom was Khunkun Singh brought a suit for a declaration of the invalidity of this very same document. At page 21 of the paper book we find the written statement of Jagannath which was filed by way of defence in that case. Not a word was said there about the consent of the other reversioners and we think it may rightly be inferred that this defence of consent was an after-thought. On the whole we are quite satisfied that there was no consent and that the plaintiff's suit was not barred on this ground.

There is however one other matter to be considered. It is proved that while Gaya Din Singh was still alive two usufructuary mortgages were executed by his mother in favour of certain mortgagees. One of these mortgages was for Rs. 40 and the other for Rs. 948.

This latter mortgage was in favour of a number of persons including the plaintiffs in the present suit and it was stated by Tulshi in his evidence that he and his brother Jesri Singh were in possession of the entire mortgaged property under this latter mortgage of Rs. 948.

It is proved that after the deed of gift was executed in favour of Jagannath he redeemed this mortgage. That fact is admitted by Tulshi Singh and is also proved by the evidence of one Mahabir Singh.

In the Court below the defendant Jagannath pleaded that if the plaintiffs were found to be entitled to the declaration they were seeking that declaration ought to be qualified with some provision for Jagannath's interests. Jagannath Singh pleaded that having freed the family property from these mortgages he should be held entitled to be re-imbursed by the reversioners who may eventually become entitled to actual possession of the property. The learned Judge of the Court below thought there was no need to make any declaration in favour of Jagannath.

The point has been argued at great length before us and we find that a similar case came before a Bench of this Court Ghansham Singh v. Tej Bahadur Singh (1). In that case the learned Judges refused to make a declaration in favour of the defendant such as was sought here by Jagannath and is now sought by Jagannath's legal representatives.

We think however that there is one fact which distinguishes the case we are now dealing with from the case just referred to. The mortgagees who have been redeemed are the plaintiffs themselves and it certainly appears to us that there can be no injustice in declaring in the present suit that in the event of these plaintiffs surviving Mt. Sonkali and becoming entitled to immediate possession of the property they ought not to be allowed to get possession from Jagannath or his legal representatives without paying their proportionate share of the mortgage debts. This equitable principle was recognised in the case reported as Mahomed Shumsool Hooda v. Shewakram (2). That was a case decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council.

While we hold therefore that the judgment of the Court below is correct and that the decree should stand we think it proper to modify the decree by inserting the following declaration, namely, that in the event of the present plaintiffs surviving Mt Sonkali they will only be entitled to actual possession of their share of the property which was mortgaged on payment to Jagannath or to Jagannath's legal representatives their quota of the mortgage debt With this variation in the decree of the Court below we dismiss this appeal.

Parties will pay their own costs.

Judgment. — This application in revision is based on a misjoinder of charges which constitutes an illegality invalidating the entire trial under the Privy Council ruling in Subrahmania Ayyar v. King Emperor (1). The six accused were tried at one trial for offences under Ss. 147 and 325 of the Indian Penal Code alleged to have been committed on the 24th of January, and at the same time for offences under Ss. 147, 323 and 342 of the Indian Penal Code alleged to have been committed on 25th January. This joint trial cannot be justified under S. 234 or 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The offences are not offences of the same kind, since the offence under S. 342 at any rate is an offence quite different from that under S. 325. Neither were the offences committed in the same transaction. It has been held in several cases that Ss. 234 and 239 of the Indian Penal Code cannot be combined e.g., Emperor v. Jiben Kristna Bagchi (2) and Emperor v. Mata Prasad (3). I must therefore, and hereby do, set aside the convictions and direct a retrial of the accused. The offences alleged to have been committed on January 24th must be tried separately from those alleged to have been committed on January 25th. I regret this result inasmuch as no objection was taken at the time of the trial or even in the appeal to the Court below. I have been asked to let the accused on bail. I make no order on this application but leave it to the Court before whom the accused may be brought to pass orders on any application that may be made to it.

Criminal P C., S. 208—Refusal of Magistrate to examine defence witnesses vitiates committal.

It is obligatory on a committing Magistrate to record such evidence as the accused wants to produce. [P. 318 C. 1.]

G. W. Dillon—for Applicants.

R. Malcomson—for the Crown.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.—This is an application asking the Court to set aside an order of committal under S. 395 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. S. 208 requires that the order of committal should not be passed till the Magistrate has heard the complainant and taken such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution or on behalf of the accused. After the evidence for the prosecution was heard and the statements of the accused persons were taken down, the Magistrate framed a charge against the accused, under S. 395 of Criminal Procedure Code, without asking the accused whether they had any evidence to produce. After the charge was read over and explained to them, an application appears to have been made on their behalf, asking that certain witnesses should be summoned. That application is not on the record; but Mr. Dillon, who appears on behalf of the accused, has satisfied the Court from a certified copy which he had in his possession that such an application was made, and the order passed by the trying Magistrate was that he could not entertain it, because it had been made after the charge had been framed and while he was writing the order of committal. The learned Magistrate also considered that it would be a waste of time to record the evidence. It was, however, obligatory on him to record such evidence as the accused wanted to produce. He put no question to them about their evidence, and as has been held in Queen-Empress v. Ahmadi (1) and Emperor v. Muhammad Hadi (2), he failed to discharge the duty imposed on him by law and passed an order of committal without considering the defence. The order of committal is, therefore, set aside and the case sent back to the trying Magistrate with a direction that he should summon and examine the witnesses which the accused may like to produce and then proceed according to law. The application aforesaid should be traced and placed upon the record.

A right of pre-emption must in the absence of statute be based either on contract or custom. In the absence of any statutory enactment or any entry in the public record of rights the custom may be deduced from a long series of decisions. Where a rule of custom is deduced from previous judgments it should in no way be departed from merely because it is thought more equitable that a new rule should prevail. [P 319) 2]

P. L. Banerji—for Applicants.

M. P. Bhargava—for Opp. Party.

Lindsay, J.—This reference raises a somewhat difficult question but, as we understand the matter, we are asked to say whether the law relating to pre-emption as laid down in a ruling of Mr. Giles, Officiating Commissioner of Kumaun, in the case of Datt Ram v. Raghunath decided on the 11th of July 1892, is or is not to be applied to the case with which we are concerned.

It seems that both the Deputy Commissioner and the Commissioner sitting in appeal have differentiated this case from the one which was considered by Mr. Giles in the ruling just referred to.

Taking the law to have been correctly laid down in Mr. Giles' judgment, we find it stated as follows :—

"For purposes of pre-emption the asl village and the laga village are one. A hissedar of a laga village has no right of pre-emption against a purchaser who is a hissedar of the asl village."

If this ruling is to be applied literally to the facts of the case with which we are now dealing, it seems to us, that the claim of the pre-emptor in this case must be disallowed for his status, at best, appears to be merely that of a hissedar of a laga village, whereas the person who is now the purchaser of the property, namely, Amla Nand is a hissedar of the asl village.

We have been referrred to a little book called the Manual of Land Tenures in the Kumaun Division compiled by Mr. Stowell.

In this book we find an asl mauza defined as being the chief or parent village to which the lagas or subsidiary villages are attached. The definition winds up by saying that the asl village and lagas are held under one revenue engagement.

Reading the judgment of Mr. Giles in the light of this definition, we take it as laying down, therefore, that where the asl village and the laga village are held under one rovenue engagement the hissedar of the laga village is not entitled to pre-empt against the hissedar of the asl village.

It is said, however. in the present case that the village Rauthiya in which the property sold is situated oes not really stand to Khandoli, the village in which the purchaser Amla Nand resides, in the relation of a laga to an asl village. In the judgment of the first appellate Court this village Rauthiya is described as pakka khaikar laga and it is said that it has its own separate settlement map and "phant." Mr. Mason, the Deputy Commissioner (District Judge) describes Rauthiya as 'being really a separate fiscal unit.

It is not clear from this description whether the learned District Judge intended to find that Rauthiya was separately assessed to revenue and was not included in the same revenue engagement as the other village Khandoli.

The Commissioner as Judge of the High Court of Kumaun, agrees with the opinion of the first appellate Court. Indeed, his judgment would lead us to believe that he intended to find that this village of Rauthiya is not at all a laga village but a village quite independent of the other village of Khandoli. In his judgment the learned Commissioner is unable to say how this village came to be recorded in the revenue papers as a laga or off-shoot of Khandoli. He certainly seems to think that it can be nothing of the sort.

It appears to us that the whole question of the right of pre-emption in this case turns upon the relation which is to be traced between these two villages Rauthya and Khandoli. If they stand to each other in the true relationship of asl and laga villages, that is to say, if they are both held under one revenue engagement, then we are of opinion that the customary law, as found by Mr Giles in his judgment in Dutt Ram v. Raghunath, ought to be followed in this case. In other words, the claim of the pre-emptor ought to fail and ought to be dismissed,

On the other hand, if it be the fact that these villages are not truly related as asl and laga villages but that the village of Rauthiya is a separate fiscal unit as decribed in the judgment of the first appellate Court, then we are of opinion that the pre-emptor in this case has a better right than the purchaser Amla Nand.

We should like to add that a right of pre-emption must, in the absence of statute be based either on contract or custom. No contract has been suggested in this case. Presumably the right claimed is based on customary law. In the absence of any statutory enactment or any entry in a public record of right, the custom may be deduced from a long series of decisions. When a rule of custom is deduced from previous judgments we are of opinion that the rule deduced therefrom should in no way be departed from merely on the ground that it is now thought more equitable or convenient that a new rule should prevail.

As regards costs in this Court we leave the parties to bear their own costs.

Cr. ef. No.548 of 1923, Decided on the 31st October 1923, from the Dt. Mag. Aligarh.

Penal Code, S. 73—Solitary confinement can not be ordered under Criminal Tribes Act.

Under S. 73 there is no authority for imposing a sentence of solitary confinement when a person is convicted under some other Criminal Act. The criminal Tribes Act (No. III of 1911) makes no provision for imposing a sentence of solitary confinement on persons convicted under that Act.

The parties were not represented.

Sulaiman, J.—In this case the accused was convicted under S. 22 of the Criminal Tribes Act (No. 3 of 1911) and was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one year including one month's solitary confinement. The learned District Magistrate has referred the case to the High Court with a recommendation that so much of the sentence as relates to the solitary confinement be set aside. This reference must be accepted.

Solitary confinements are imposed under S. 73 of the Indian Penal Code. Under that section whenever any person is convicted of an offence for which under that Code the Court has power to sentence him to rigorous imprisonment the Court may by its sentence order that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for any portion of the imprisonment to which he has been sentenced. Under that section there is no authority for imposing a sentence of solitary confinement when a person is convicted under some other Criminal Act. The Criminal Tribes Act (No 3 of 1911) makes no provision for imposing a sentence of solitary confinement on persons convicted under that Act. I am therefore of opinion that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to order that any part of the sentence of the accused should be one of solitary confinement. I accordingly set aside that part of the order. Let the record be returned.

Order set aside.

Criminal Trial — Procedure — Order to accused to be ready with defence, before prosecution evidence is over, is improper.

An order to the accused before prosecution witnesses are examined, that he must be ready with his witnesses for the defence on a certain date, is an improper order. [P330 C 2]

S. N. Mookerjee and S. B. Johari—for Applicant.

Judgment.—The Additional Sessions Judge having jurisdiction over the Etah district has reported this case recommending that the trial under S. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure be set aside and that a fresh trial be ordered in some other district either Budaun or Aligarh.

In his order dated the 16th January, 1923, the learned Sessions Judge refers to certain irregularities which were committed at the trial in the Court of the Deputy Magistrate.

It is not necessary for me to refer to all that is set out in the referring order of the Judge nor perhaps would I be able to subscribe to all the criticism which the learned Additional Sessions Judge has passed upon the procedure in the Deputy Magistrate's Court. However, there is this much to be said that the learned Additional Sessions Judge has laid stress upon an irregular order which was passed by the Deputy Magistrate on the 14th November 1922. The Deputy Magistrate has been asked for an explanation and his explanation is before me. He tried to defend his order of the 14th November 1922, by stating that it merely amounted to a warning to the accused person that he would be called upon to enter upon his defence on the 29th November, after the remaining prosecution witnesses had been examined. I have examined the order which was passed by the Deputy Magistrate on the 14th November 1922. That order which is repeated in the Furd ahkam distinctly states that the accused was informed that he must be ready with his witnesses for the defence on the 29th November. I agree with the learned Additional Sessions Judge in holding that this was an improper order.

I do not propose to discuss the other irregularities which are set out in the order of the Additional Sessions Judge beyond saying that I am not prepared to hold that it was not open to the Deputy Magistrate to demand enhanced bail during the course of the trial if there were circumstances which in the opinion of the Deputy Magistrate called for that course to be taken.

I have decided, however, that in the interests of the accused it is proper that a fresh trial should be had and, accepting the recommendation of the Additional Sessions Judge, I direct that the former trial be set aside and that the accused be tried de novo in the Aligarh district in such competent Court as the District Magistrate of Aligarh may appoint for that purpose.

F. A. F. O. No. 85 of 1923, decided on 18th December, 1923, from the order of District Judge, Azamgarh, dated 3rd February, 1923.

Wajib-ul-arz—Pre-emption—Right of redemption given to a stranger cannot be a record of custom.

A provision in a wajib-ul-arz which confers a right of redemption upon a person who is a stranger to a mortgage cannot in any sense be treated as being a record of a custom. The general presumption is that an entry in the wajib-ul-arz which is headed "custom of pre-emption" is to be treated as the record of a custom. This principle, however, has always been qualified by one condition, namely, that it shall not be apparent from anything in the wajib-ul-arz itself that what purports to be the record of a custom is in reality the record of a contract or agreement arrived at by the co-sharers amongst themselves at the time of the settlement. [P. 322, Cs. 1 & 2.]

Iqbal Ahmad—for Appellant.

S. N. Sen—for Respondent.

Lindsay, J.:—This is a defendant's appeal which has arisen out of a suit for pre-emption. It came before a Bench consisting of Mr. Justice Sulaiman and myself and in view of the course which the case took in the lower appellate Court we found it necessary to refer it for decision to a Full Bench by our order, dated the 22nd of November last.

The question is one of general importance for we have to construe a wajib-ul-arz of a type which is very common in the Azamgarh District. This case we may mention comes from the district of Azamgarh.

A string of cases beginning with the case of Surajbali Singh v. Muhammad Nasir (1) has laid down certain principles of decision which govern the interpretation of wajib-ul-arzes which are framed in this peculiar way and if those cases are to be followed it must be held in the case now before us that the wajib-ul-arz relied upon by the plaintiff does not contain a record of custom.

In thi particular case, however, the Judge of the lower appellate Court considered that he was entitled to rely upon an older case than the case to which I have referred, namely, the case in the Allahabad Law Journal Reports. The case which was relied upon by the Judge in the Court below was the Full Bench case of Majidan v. Hayatan (2). In that case with one exception perhaps the language of the wajib-ul-arz under consideration was identical with the wajib-ul-arz with which we are concerned in the present appeal and there can be no doubt whatever that the Full Bench in that case decided that the wajib-ul-arz before them did set out a record of custom.

The particular point upon which the controversy turns in this case is one which arises out of the concluding words of the clause relating to pre-emption. The clause begins by reciting the general rule about pre-emption and specifying the classes of co-sharers who are entitled to preference and to take in the order of that preference. Following upon this recital there is a further recital that in the case of out and out sales the purchase-money is to be calculated at a rate of interest equivalent to 6 per cent. per annum, and in case of other transfers, not being out and out sales the sum which changes hands is to be calculated at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum.

Then follows another provision that if in the case of a mortgage by conditional sale the mortgagor is unable to redeem and the property be about to be foreclosed, a co-sharer, according to his right of pre-emption as recited above, would be entitled to pay off the mortgagee and to take possession of the property till he is himself redeemed by the mortgagor.

A clause framed in this latter language was in the wajib-ul-arz which was under consideration in the Full Bench case of Majidan v. Hayatan (2) in the year 1897 and there can be no doubt that the attention of the learned Judges composing that Bench was directed to the provisions of this clause. On the other hand it is to be observed that there is nothing in the report of the case which would indicate that any argument was ever raised before the learned Judges as to whether a recital of this kind could properly be treated as recital of custom.

Referring to the case of Suraj Bali v. Muhammad Nasir (1), it is clear that this matter was argued before the Judges of the special pre-emption Bench and in dealing with this matter the learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment pointed out that a clause similar to the clause we are now considering conferred a right of redemption upon a person who had no interest whatever in the mortgaged property.

(1) (1918) 16 A.L.J. 879.

(2) (1897) A.W.N. 3.

In that case too there were, as in the present case, certain conditions which laid down the price at which the property could be purchased or mortgaged.

We have no doubt whatever that the case of Surajbali Singh was decided on the principle that the last clause in the wajib-ul-arz contained matter which could not properly or possibly be the subject of custom, and that being so, the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judges was that, although prima facie the wajib-ul-arz was a record of custom the internal evidence in the case overturned this presumption and showed that the record was not in truth a record of custom.

This case of Surajibali Singh v. Muhammad Nasir (1) was decided on the principle which was laid down in the earlier case of Fazal Husain v. Muhammad Sharif (3). The relevant passage is to be found at page 473, and the principle there laid down is that where a wajib-ul-arz in the very same clause in which reference to pre-emption is made, contains reference to other matters which could not possibly be matters of custom, it ought to be held that the record is not one of custom at all.

It is not necessary therefore to enter into discussion of the cases decided subsequent to the case of Surajbali Singh. They have all been decided upon the principle which has just been enunciated.

Speaking for myself, I have no doubt whatever that the decision of Richards, C.J., in Surajbali Singh's case was perfectly correct and that a provision in a wajib-ul-arz which confers a right of redemption upon a person who is stranger to a mortgage cannot in any sense be treated as being a record of a custom.

That being so, and following the cersus curiae, I am of opinion that in the present case the wajib-ul-arz ought not to be treated as containing a record of custom and consequently the finding of the Court below ought to have been that the custom of pre-emption was not proved.

There is, of course, the additional reason already mentioned, namely, that this wajib-ul-arz professes to lay down the rates at which sales and mortgages are to be made and it is hardly necessary to say that an entry of this nature could not possibly be a record of custom.

It is however necessary to express an opinion regarding the soundness of the judgment in the Full Bench case of Majidan v. Hayatan (2) and it was for that purpose that this reference was made to a Full Bench. Speaking for myself, I am of opinion that that case cannot be held to be authority against the view which has prevailed since the pre-emption Bench has been constituted. As I have mentioned, the particular point with which we are dealing here was never raised before that Full Bench and in my opinion it cannot rightly be laid down that a record conferring a right of redemption upon a stranger to a mortgage can be a record of custom. If the Full Bench case of Majidan v. Hayatan (2) purports to lay down the law in any other sense then, in my opinion, it ought to be overruled and declared to be no longer good law.

Piggott, J.:—I concur with Mr. Justice Lindsay. We start with the general presumption that an entry in the wajib-ul-arz, and more particularly an entry such as the one before us in this case, which is headed "custom of pre-emption", is to be treated as the record of a custom. This principle, however, has always been qualified by one condition, namely, that it shall not be apparent from anything in the wajib-ul-arz itself that what purports to be the record of a custom is in reality the record of a contract or agreement, arrived at by the co-sharers amongst themselves at the time of the settlement. The necessity for such a qualification is obvious. You might conceivably have a wajib-ul-arz entry under the above heading which began by expressly reciting that there had hitherto been no custom of pre-emption in the village, but went on to say that the co-sharers agreed among themselves to be governed hereafter by such and such rules in the matter. This of course is an extreme case, but entries of this kind have actually come under the notice of this Court; it would be clearly preposterous to lay down the principle that such an entry must be regarded as the record of a custom, because in the wajib-ul-arz it has been wrongly inserted in the place provided for the record of the custom relating to pre-emption. Now in the present case we have an entry which begins in the ordinary way in which one would expect the record of a custom to start. So far so good; but immediately after the words which, standing by themselves, appear to be a valid record of an existing custom, there follow special provisions as to the price at which the party claiming pre-emption is to be entitled to purchase or to take up a mortgage. Immediately after this comes a provision of a special and peculiar character, permitting other co-sharers under certain circumstances to redeem a mortgage in which they have no concern whatsoever, except that they are the co-sharers of the mortgagor. What strikes me most about the right recorded in favour of co-sharers in this clause is, that it offends against the very essence of a right of pre-emption. The co-sharer redeeming a mortgage under this clause does not acquire the proprietary title of the mortgagor. He does not, in any sense of the words, step into the shoes of the mortgagor. Neither does he step into the shoes of the mortgagee; for it is clearly not intended by the entry in the wajib-ul-arz that a co-sharer so redeeming shall acquire the right of foreclosure which the mortgagee held under his contract of mortgage. The effect of the transaction outlined in this clause of the wajib-ul-arz, assuming it to be carried out, would be to put the co-sharer exercising this right of redemption into possession as an ordinary usufructuary mortgagee, subject to a liability to be redeemed by the original mortgagor, presumably within the period of limitation prescribed by law for the redemption of the original mortgage. It does not seem to me that a right of this sort can possibly be created by custom. I therefore agree with Mr. Justice Lindsay in holding that the wajib-ul-arz which we are considering, in view of those entries inserted under the heading of "custom of pre-emption" to which I have referred, cannot be treated as the record of a custom existing at the time when it was drawn up, but must be regarded as the record of an agreement come to by the co-sharers amongst themselves at the time.

Sulaiman, J.:—I have come to the same conclusion. It is true that when there is an entry of a right of pre-emption in a wajib-ul-arz there is a prima facie presumption that it is an entry of custom. At the same time if that very clause which recites such a right contains other matters relating to the transfer or devolution of property which cannot possibly be a record of custom, then that presumption is negatived. It is open to the Courts then to say that the evidence produced by the plaintiff in support of the alleged custom is totally insufficient even to raise a presumption that custom exists. The question therefore which we have to consider in this case is whether there are any other matters contained in clause 13 of the wajib-ul-arz of 1872 which negative the idea that that entry was a record of custom. Two matters have been specially referred to by the learned Advocate for the defendant-appellant before us. The first is that that clause contains a recital that if in the case of a mortgage by conditional sale the mortgagor is unable to redeem and the property be on the point of foreclosure and a notice for foreclosure has been issued to the mortgagor, a co-sharer by virtue of his right of pre-emption would be entitled to pay off the mortgagee and to take possession of the property till he is himself redeemed by the mortgagor.

I concede at once that if a right is given which in any way overrides a statutory provision such a right cannot possibly be a record of custom. The question is whether this particular right was in any way in contraventionof Regulation XVII of 1806 which was in force at the time when this wajib-ul-arz was prepared. I am unable to say that such a right had necessarily the effect of overriding the provisions of that Regulation. Under that Regulation the mortgagee was bound to submit to the property being taken away from him and the foreclosure prevented, if the amount due on the mortgage was deposited within the year of grace by the mortgagor or his legal representatives. I do not think that a custom which gave the co-sharers a right to intervene and take the place of the mortgagor and prevent foreclosure can necessarily be said to be absurd, unreasonable or illegal. Under the present law, when property is transferred to a stranger under a registered document, the vendee obtains absolute rights under the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. Can it be said that the right of a pre-emptor who comes into Court to claim pre-emption necessarily implies an overriding of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act? All that the co-sharers would be entitled to do would be to obtain possession of the property and remain in possession of it as the mortgagee would have done if no proceedings for foreclosure had been taken.

In order therefore to see whether such a right could not possibly be the basis of a custom and could not possibly have been recognized by a Court of law, we have to see whether in earlier cases such a right was ever referred to or assumed. I may here point out that in the case of Ashik Ali v. Mathura Kandu (4), two learned Judges of this Court remarked that there might be a right under which co-sharers would be able to enforce pre-emption either immediately upon the execution of the mortgage, or by redemption during the year of grace after issue of the notice of foreclosure, or after the sale became absolute. The wajib-ul-arz which was before the Full Bench in the case of Majidan v. Hayatan (2) also clearly contained a similar provision for pre-mortgage or redemption during the year of grace. The learned Judges who disposed of that case certainly expressed the view that there was nothing in that clause which showed necessarily that the record was one of contract and not of custom, and they pointed out that the paragraph referred to a practice which prevailed as to the redemption of mortgages by the sharer or the co-sharers and as to pre-emption in the case of conditional sales. Then, again, in the case of Gaya Bharthi v. Lakhnath Rai (5), another Full Bench case, three learned Judges of this Court at least assumed that there was a right in co-sharers to claim pre-emption at two stages, firstly, when the mortgage by conditional sale was executed, and secondly, after a suit for foreclosure had been instituted but before a decree for foreclosure had been actually passed. I have no doubt in my mind that if one were to search the old reports many more cases may be found. When therefore we have an expression of opinion by at least six learned Judges of this Court, who were well familiar with the customary law of pre-emption, and find that they assumed if not recognized, the possibility of the enforcement of such a right, can it be said that such a right is so absurd or illegal as cannot possibly be the basis of a custom? If, therefore, there had been nothing further in the clause but only this provision, I would not have been prepared to hold that the record is necessarily one of contract.

There is, however, a further condition in the same clause under which the right of pre-emption can be enforced in favour of the co-sharers at a fixed price. Such a condition in my opinion is certainly absurd and cannot be the result of a growth of custom. If this condition were to be enforced the consequences would be startling. A co-sharer at all future times would be bound to offer for the property a fixed price, regardless of the market value of the property, to the other co-sharers. He would be forced to submit to transfer it to co-sharers at a very inadequate price although purchasers for higher value were available. It would also follow that even if a stranger did actually pay a fancy price or even the market price the co-sharers would be entitled to take the property from him on payment of not the price he paid, but a price calculated at the smaller fixed rate. This, in my opinion, would place an unreasonable restraint on a co-sharer's power of alienation, and could not be enforced by a Court of law. As this condition is inseparably connected with the alleged custom of pre-emption, I am of opinion, that there can be no presumption that the clause was a record of custom. I also would therefore allow this appeal, set aside the order of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance.

By the Court:—We allow this appeal, set aside the order of remand and restore the decree of the Court of first instance with costs to the defendant throughout.

Appeal allowed.

PIGGOTT, LINDSAY AND SULAIMAN, JJ.

Alkhu Rai and others—Appellants

v.

Lachhman Upadhiya—Respondent.

S. A. No. 1507 of 1921, decided on 17th December, 1923, from the decree of District Judge, Ghazipur, dated 25th May, 1921.

(a) Deed—Construction of identical document under identical circumstances only is useful as guide.

Any ruling as to the interpretation of a document can only be applied in its entirety to a document absolutely identical in language and in a case the general circumstances of which are substantially the same. Where these conditions are not satisfied a party relying upon previous rulings of the Court and putting them forward as guides to the correct interpretation of the particular document on which the case under appeal actually turns can do nothing more than ask the Court to take into consideration the general principles which have been applied by other Hon'ble Judges in similar cases and to derive from them whatever assistance it can towards arriving at a correct conclusion. [P. 325, C. 2.]

(b) Wajib-ul-arz — Pre-emption—Foreclosure of mortgage is not sale.

Where the record of the custom in the wajib-ul-arz is in the following terms :

"If one of the co-sharers desires to make a mortgage, or a mortgage by conditional sale or an out-and-out-sale, he must do so on the same adequate price as may be offered by other parties, in the first instance, to a near co-sharer in the same patti ; next to other co-sharers in the patti ; if they will not take, then to a near co-sharer in another patti ; next, to any co-sharer in the mahal and finally to a stranger." Held, the plaintiffs' cause of action accrued to them on the date of the mortgage and the subsequent foreclosure of that mortgage was not a transfer by a co-sharer by way of sale within the meaning of the custom as recorded in the wajib-ul-arz. The terms of the wajib-ul-arz contemplate a voluntary sale and not a transfer which is effected by compulsion of law. (3 All. 610, Dist.) [P. 325, C. 1 and P. 327, Cs. 1 and 2.]

M. L. Agarwala and U. S. Bajpai—for Appellants.

Haribans Sahai and Iqbal Ahmad—for Respondents.

Piggott, J. :—The facts out of which this appeal arises are sufficiently stated in the referring order. The essential point for determination is whether, under a custom described in the wajib-ul-arz, the plaintiffs-appellants have or have not a right of pre-emption in respect of a foreclosure decree which was made absolute on the 12th April 1919. The said decree was passed on a mortgage by conditional sale executed in the year 1861. The record of the custom in the wajib-ul-arz is in the following terms :—

"If one of the co-sharers desires to make a mortgage, or a mortgage by conditional sale, or an out-and-out-sale, he must do so on the same adequate price as may be offered by other parties, in the first instance to a near co-sharer in the same patti, next to other co-sharers in the patti, if they will not take, then to a near co-sharer in another patti : next to any co-sharer in the mahal, and finally to a stranger".

If we were called upon to interpret these words, apart altogether from any decisions which have been pronounced or reported in other cases, I cannot say that I should feel any serious difficulty as to their meaning. I understand them to mean that a right of pre-emption is violated, and a cause of action given to the persons possessing pre-emptive rights in the order specified above, in the event of an ordinary mortgage in favour of a stranger, or of a mortgage by conditional sale in favour of a stranger, or of an out-and-out sale to a stranger. In each of these cases the violation of the right would occur, and the cause of action would accrue, from the date of the ordinary mortgage, the mortgage by conditional sale and the out-and-out sale respectively. I cannot read anything into the provisions of the wajib-ul-arz, as quoted above, which would warrant the conclusion that, in the case of a mortgage by conditional sale, a pre-emptor whose rights were violated by the mortgage contract is entitled, either to claim to be placed at once in the shoes of the mortgagee, or to wait until proceedings are taken for foreclosure and then to prefer his claim to be placed, as owner of the property, in the shoes of the mortgagee, after the latter has enforced his rights to foreclosure by process of law.

It has, however, been contended that there is a great deal of case-law which requires to be considered before a correct interpretation can be placed upon the provisions of this wajib-ul-arz. With reference to this argument I would take this general point, that any ruling as to the interpretation of a document can only be applied in its entirety to a document absolutely identical in language, and in a case the general circumstances of which are substantially the same. Where these conditions are not satisfied, an appellant, or a respondent, relying upon previous rulings of the Court and putting them forward as guides to the correct interpretation of the particular document on which the case under appeal actually turns, can do nothing more than ask the Court to take into consideration the general principles which have been applied by other Hon'ble Judges in similar cases and to derive from them whatever assistance it can, towards arriving at a correct conclusion.

Looking at the matter from this point of view, I think that, of all the cases which have been cited to us, the one most immediately in point is that of Sundar Kaur v. Ram Ghulam (1). The learned Judges who decided that case were dealing with a wajib-ul-arz the terms of which were so far analogous to those of the document we are seeking to interpret, in that a right of pre-emption was given in respect of transfers either by mortgage or by sale. Furthermore, in the decision of that case, reference is made to the previous Full Bench ruling of this Court which has been most strongly relied upon by the plaintiff in appeal before us. This is the case of Alu Prasad v. Sukhan (2). The point taken by Richards, C. J., in discussing this older ruling is, in substance, the one which I have myself ventured to make. He treats the question as being essentially one of the interpretation of a document, and he holds that he is not bound to put a particular interpretation upon a particular document because observations made by the learned Judges of the Court, in a case in which the general circumstances were not the same, and the document to be interpreted was not in identical terms, serve to suggest that, if the said Judges had to decide the case then before the Court, they might have interpreted the document under consideration in a particular way. The decision actually arrived at in Sundar Kuar v. Ram Ghulam and others supports the view that I should myself be disposed to take of the wajib-ul-arz now before us

It has been admitted in argument that this view in accordance, generally, with the principles of interpretation applied to evidence of custom in cases which have come before this Court on appeal since the constitution of the pre-emption Bench. On behalf of the appellants reliance is placed on certain older cases of this Court, and in particular the argument is preferred that the pre-emption Bench has in effect overruled older Full Bench decisions and has applied to the decision of cases before it principles inconsistent with those affirmed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Batul Begam v. Mansur Ali Khan (3). The point of their Lordships' decision in that case is to be found in the remarks at the close of the judgment, wherein they approved of the decision of this Court in Ali Abbas v. Kalka (4). Now, with regard to this case, as also to the one which went before the Privy Council, it seems to me important to notice that these were cases in which a claim for pre-emption was dismissed, and was dismissed upon a finding of limitation. The actual decision therefore in each case amounted to no more than this, that a cause of action had accrued to the pre-emptor at least from the date on which something had happened amounting to the foreclosure of a mortgage by conditional sale. The question whether any cause of action had or had not accrued before that date was one which it was no concern of either party in the cases then before the Court to argue. The decisions in themselves are not authority for anything more than what was actually decided. The real difficulty, so far as there is any, arises out of the older case Alu Prasad v. Sukhan (2). It is to be noted that this case was decided by a Full Bench of five Judges and that there was very considerable difference of opinion. The case was one in which there had been a transfer by way of mortgage by conditional sale, and this had been followed by foreclosure proceedings under the old Regulation in force before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, No. IV of 1882. According to the head-note, the five Judges who heard the appeal were divided into three distinct categories of opinion. Pearson, J., held that a cause of action for a pre-emption suit had arisen from the date of the mortgage by conditional sale, and that no subsequent cause of action arose out of the foreclosure proceedings. Stuart, C. J., held that no cause of action accrued to the plaintiff on the date of the mortgage, but that he had a cause of action from the date of the foreclosure proceedings. The remaining three Judges constituting the Bench were of opinion that causes of action accrued to the plaintiff pre-emptor on both dates, but that he had a right to bring a suit on the strength of the later of the two causes of action, even though he had ignored the first. Personally, after examining the judgment delivered by Straight, J., in detail, I should feel disposed to question the correctness of the head-note. I very much doubt if Straight, J., did not intend to hold that on the terms of the particular custom which the Court held to be proved in that case, the plaintiff pre-emptor could not have brought a claim to pre-empt on the mortgage, and if so, he was in agreement with the Chief Justice on this point. At any rate, the learned Judges were very much divided, as has above been shown. They were dealing with a record-of-rights the wording of which was certainly not identical with that of the wajib-ul-arz which we are considering. Moreover, they were dealing with foreclosure proceedings which had taken place under the old Regulation. In my opinion, therefore, the ruling in this case cannot be quoted as in itself determining any specific point of law in such a manner as to bind subsequent decisions. If we are asked to consider the opinions expressed by the learned Judges who then constituted the Full Bench of this Court, we are certainly bound to receive with all due respect the views upon questions of law expressed by those Judges; but so far as I am personally concerned, I can only say the line of reasoning followed by Pearson, J., in his dissentient judgment appeals more strongly to my mind than anything else which I can find in the report of the case.

To conclude, therefore, I am of opinion that, if the question now before us is to be determined apart altogether from previous authorities of the Court, then this appeal ought to fail, because upon a plain and straightforward construction of the terms of the wajib-ul-arz the plaintiffs' cause of action accrued to them on the date of the mortgage, and the subsequent foreclosure of that mortgage was not a transfer by a co-sharer by way of sale within the meaning of the custom as recorded in the wajib-ul-arz. On the question of authority, it seems to me that the balance of authority is also on the whole in favour of the same view, and that the decision of the Full Bench in Alu Prasad v. Sukhan (2) may fairly be distinguished, and should not be regarded as binding us to put upon the wajib-ul-arz in this particular case the interpretation contended for by the appellants. I would therefore dismiss this appeal with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

Lindsay, J.:—I agree.

Sulaiman, J.:—I agree that every case of pre-emption must be judged on its own merits. In such a case it is not sufficient for the plaintiff pre-emptor merely to prove that there is a general custom of pre-emption prevailing in the village. It is incumbent on him to establish such particulars of that custom as would entitle him to a decree. In the present case the plaintiffs came into Court on the allegation that there was a custom in the village under which, if a mortgage by conditional sale was foreclosed by a decree of the Civil Court, the co-sharers had a right to intervene and take the property by pre-emption from the succeseful plaintiff. In order to establish such a custom the sole evidence produced consisted of an entry in an old wajib-ul-arz which has been recited in full by my learned brother. Independently of all authorities, I would agree that the only interpretation which can be put on the terms of that wajib-ul-arz would be to hold that that cannot apply to a case like the present. The plaintiffs claimed that they had a cause of action to bring the suit for pre-emption on the date when the foreclosure decree was passed. It cannot be said that on that date the defendant-vendor was wishing to make a mortgage by conditional sale or an absolute sale in favour of the old mortgagee. I am of opinion that the terms of the wajib ul-arz as they stand contemplate a voluntary sale and not a transfer which is effected by compulsion of law.

The learned Vakil for the plaintiffs has relied on a number of earlier cases of this Court including those of Alu Prasad v. Sukhan (1), Ali Abbas v. Kalka Prasad (4), and Batul Begam v. Mansur Ali Khan (5), all of which were Full Bench cases, and also, on the Privy Council case of Batul Begam v. Mansur Ali Khan (3). The argument before us has been that in view of the expression of opinion in these Full Bench cases the word "sale" in the wajib-ul-arz should be given a wide meaning so as to include the extinguishment of the right of the mortgagor by foreclosure. The learned Vakil does not say that the present wajib-ul-arz should be interpreted in the light of the interpretation put upon the wajib-ul-arz in the earlier cases. What he has really contended is that the word "sale" should be taken in its general and wider meaning and not in its narrow meaning as defined by the Transfer of Property Act.

If the present case had arisen under the old Regulations and had been governed by those Regulations, I am bound to say that on the authorities cited before us I would have felt compelled to hold that the word "sale" must be taken in its general meaning so as to include the extinguishment of the right of redemption on foreclosure. That, however, is not the case. It is well known that before the Regulations came into force a mortgage by conditional sale used to become absolute on the expiry of the period fixed. The object of the Regulations was somewhat to protect the rights of redemption of a mortgagor, and to give him a further period of grace. It was however held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Alexander John Forbes v. Ameeroonnissa Begam (6), that the proceedings following an application under section 7 of the old Regulations up to the order passed under section 8 of those Regulations were purely a ministerial act and not a judicial act. It was on this ground that the majority of the learned Judges in 3 All. 610 above referred to came to the conclusion that the foreclosure was the consequence of the mortgagor's failure to redeem the mortgage; that it was really the result of his own act and not on account of any intervention by the Court. Under the present law, however, suits for foreclosure are governed by the Code of Civil Procedure. The proceedings taken with regard to the foreclosure of a mortgage are proceedings in Court and the equity of redemption is extinguished by a decree of the Court. It cannot therefore be said that the right of redemption is extinguished by any act of the mortgagor himself. I am therefore of opinion that even accepting the view which was laid down in the earlier Full Bench cases, the soundness of the opinion in one of which, namely, 14 All. 405, appealed to their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case reported in 24 All. 17, those cases are distinguishable on the main ground that suits for foreclosure are now governed by statute. I am fortified in this view by the opinion expressed by the Full Bench in the case of Gaya Bharthi v. Lakhnath Rai (7) that a claim for pre-emption could not be enforced after the order absolute for foreclosure under the Transfer of Property Act had been passed.

I also would therefore dismiss the appeal.

WALSH, RYVES AND MUKERJI, JJ.

Mubarak Hussain—Applicant

v.

Ahmad and others—Opposite party.

E.S.A. No. 627 of 1923, decided on 22nd February, 1924, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Muzaffarnagar.

(a) Interpretation of statutes—Comparison with old law is permitted in case of doubt.

Per Mookerjee, J.—Though reference to the old law is not a valid mode of interpreting new law yet in cases of doubt, old law may be referred to. [P. 335, C. 2.]

(b) Interpretation of statutes—Purpose of enactment.

Per Walsh, J.—Where a section or an Act is capable of two interpretations the purpose of the enactment must be looked into. [P. 336, C. 2.]

(c) Civ. Pro. Code, S. 60.

An agriculturist can make a valid mortgage of his house in execution of a decree in which the house may be sold. If the agriculturist fails to raise the point in the suit itself he cannot raise it in the execution.

Per Ryves, J.—A house mortgaged by the agriculturists cannot be sold in execution of a decree though the judgment-debtor may have failed to raise the point in the course of the suit.

Per Walsh, J.—A sale in execution of any decree and in enforcement of a mortgage decree are mutually exclusive and a sale under a mortgage decree is not in execution of the decree but merely in satisfaction of the decree. The word 'such' in the proviso of S. 60 removes the distinction which the word 'or' would otherwise have in the expression 'attachment or sale' which must therefore mean attachment or sale in execution of decree. S. 60 does not apply to a sale under a mortgage decree.

S. 60 applies to all decrees. Therefore it forbids the sale of a mortgaged house of an agriculturist.

Per Mookerjee, J.—S. 60 deals with sales in execution of decrees in which a previous attachment is necessary, i.e., sales in execution of money decrees.

N. C. Vaish—for Appellant.

Ryves, J.:—This is a decree-holder's second appeal in execution.

The judgment-debtor mortgaged two houses to the decree-holder. In a suit on the mortgage the decree-holder obtained an ex parte decree under Order 34, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, and that was made absolute under rule 6 of the same Order. The judgment-debtor so far raised no defence. When, however, the decree-holder applied for the sale of the houses, he took objection inter alia that "he was a cultivator by occupation and the houses sought to be sold by auction in this case were used by him as such. The implements of husbandry were kept in it. The cattle were also tethered in it. They were not used by the objector as dwelling houses. Therefore, they should not be sold by auction according to law." This objection was disallowed by the Court executing the decree. On appeal the lower appellate Court found as follows :—

"It is clear from the evidence adduced by the appellant, and which has not been rebutted by the decree-holder-respondent, that the objector is an agriculturist and occupies both the houses as such. The finding of the lower Court that these houses are not appurtenant to the land he cultivates is clearly wrong. The irresistable conclusion from the evidence on the record is that the houses in dispute belong to an agriculturist."

Having come to this finding which, of course, is binding on us, he decided that under section 60 of Civil Procedure Code, following the ruling in 51 Indian Cases, page 553, to which I shall refer later, the houses could not be sold in execution of the mortgage decree.

The decree-holder comes here in second appeal.

In view of the fact that there are two reported decisions of this Court which are directly in conflict, the case has been referred to a Bench of three Judges.

The question before us is shortly whether section 60 (1) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code bars the sale in this case.

It is argued on behalf of the appellant that it does not for two reasons :—

(1) That the executing Court cannot go behind the decree which it has to execute and (2) that section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code, together with the provisos contained in it, only applies to the execution of simple money decrees.

It is a truism to say that a Court executing a decree cannot go behind it, but I think this only means that the Court executing the decree cannot vary it, but must take it as it stands. But I think it is open to the Legislature to say that certain kinds of property shall not, in any circumstances, even if so ordered, be sold in execution proceedings.

As an example, section 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act (No. II of 1901) enacts that the interest of an occupancy tenant is not transferable in execution of a decree of a Civil or Revenue Court; and it has been held by a Full Bench of this Court (of which I was a member) in Katwari v. Sita Ram (1), that an occupancy holding cannot be sold in execution of a decree even when the decree specifically directed its sale.

If the Legislature can forbid a Court to execute a decree in one instance, it seems to me it can do so in other cases; and the question which remains to be answered here is whether, as a matter of law, the Legislature has chosen to prevent an executing Court from selling the houses in this case which the decree directed to be sold.

I think myself that the ruling which I have just quoted, although it is based on the mandatory probibition set out in section 20 of the Arga Tenancy Act, in principle, covers this case also, unless, perhaps, it can be held that section 60 only refers to simple money decrees. Leaving this question aside for the present, the proviso to section 60 (1) is as follows :—

"The following particulars shall not be liable to such attachment or sale, namely :—

(c) houses and other buildings (with the materials and the sites thereof and the land immediately appurtenant thereto and necessary for their enjoyment) belonging to an agriculturist and occupied by him."

It seems to me that on the findings of the lower appellate Court these two houses which the decree ordered to be sold come within the clause just quoted.

On the second question it has been argued that section 60 only applies to simple money decrees. It is said that provision is made for mortgage decrees in Order 34. This argument is based on two grounds :—

(1) Section 60 comes in that part of the Code which deals with "attachment"; and attachment is not necessary in mortgage decrees. Before property can be sold in execution of a money decree, the Court must first attach it so as to bring it within its jurisdiction, and then sell it. In a mortgage decree, the decree itself specifically directs the sale of the mortgaged property.

(1) (1921) 43 All. 547.

It seems to me, apart from all authority, that the proviso to the section is perfectly general and applies to all decrees. I think so, firstly, because, if it was meant to apply only to smiple money decrees, it would have been very easy for the Legislature to have said so; and in the second place, reading the exceptions, I think that the Legislature from motives of public policy or for other reasons which seemed good to it, but which it is unnecessary for us even to speculate about, has thought fit to prevent a Court executing a decree from selling off any of the various particulars detailed in the section.

Another argument on this point is that if clause (c) was held to apply to houses of an agriculturist which he has mortgaged it would be tantamount to holding that the mortgage of such houses was illegal and it would be open to the mortgagor in the suit on the mortgage to raise this objection. I do not think the mortgagor could be heard to raise any such objection; but the question is whether, if a decree is passed for the sale of such a house, the Court in execution can or cannot sell it. This question, it seems to me, "does not fall to arise" (to adopt a dictum in a recent ruling of the Privy Council) until execution proceedings have been taken.

As a matter of fact, in these provinces an agriculturist, that is to say, a cultivator in an agricultural village who cultivates plots of land within the "mauza" under a lease from the zamindar is given a house, then unoccupied, or a site in that part of the "mauza" which is set apart for the tenants and other members of the village community to reside in, (called the abadi) and if no house is available on these sites, he is allowed to build houses for himself to reside in, and for his cattle employed in cultivation, and for storing his implements of agriculture. As a general rule, (except in exceptional cases, where a custom to the contrary prevails) such a tenant cannot transfer such houses at all. All that he can transfer is the materials with which they are built. The site is not his to transfer; it belongs to the zamindar. If such an agriculturist mortgaged his houses and the mortgagee obtains a decree for the sale of the house, even if the mortgagor was estopped from objecting to the sale after a decree for its sale had been passed, the zamindar certainly could intervene and prevent the site of the house being sold. It seems to me that the Legislature has gone further and has chosen to forbid the sale of such houses or their materials in execution even of a mortgage decree.

Clause (b) of the same section prevents the tools of an artizan being sold in execution of a dcree. This does not mean that an artizan cannot raise money on the security or pledge of his tools. It simply means, I think, that if the creditor has to sue and gets a decree against an artizan, he cannot in execution of that decree get such tools sold by the Court, even if the decree ordered the sale of the tools. I am fortified in this view, (namely, that the bar in execution in no way affects the validity or legality of the contract), by section 61, which immediately follows and is in the same division of the Act as section 60. By that section the Local Government with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council may declare that such portion of agricultural produce, or of any class of agricultural produce, as may appear to the Local Government to be necessary for the purposes mentioned therein shall be exempted from liability to attachment or sale in execution of a decree. It is a common practice in these provinces for agriculturists to borrow money for the purposes of agriculture on the security of the crop about to be raised. These contracts have always been held, so far as I know, to be perfectly legal, and in execution of a decree, the crop can be attached and sold; but under this section, at any time the Local Government may prevent by notification, the sale of such a crop in execution of a decree. This must happen after the contract had been made. It obviously does not make the contract illegal. All it does is to prevent the decree-holder when he gets his decree, from enforcing it by the sale of the crop hypothecated. He may enforce it otherwise if he can. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no force in this argument and I think, reading the Act as it stands, that the decision of the Court below was right and that the houses mortgaged in this suit cannot be sold in execution of the mortgage decree, not because the mortgage of the houses was illegal or that the mortgagor could have pleaded that no decree for sale should be passed, but because the Legislature forbids absolutely such houses to be sold by a Court in execution.

I now come to discuss the authorities. The first case on the point is, Bhagwandas v. Hathibhai (2). It was held in that case that section 266 of the old Code of Civil Procedure, then in force, which is similar to the present Code, does not prohibit the sale of property specifically mortgaged albeit that the property be materials of a house belonging to or occupied by an agriculturist. The judgment is a very short one and the only reason given for the decision is contained in these words:—

"We are of opinion that the sale of the house, under these circumstances (namely, that the decree directed that the debt should be recovered from the mortgaged property) should be made, for we cannot suppose that it was the intention of section 266 of Act X of 1877 to prohibit the sale of property specifically mortgaged."

That decision was reported in 1879 and, so far as I can find, it has never been referred to since in any reported decision, except in the case of Tota Ram v. Chain Sukh (3). In that case, Edge, C. J., said, distinguishing this ruling, "It will be time enough to consider that case when I am compelled to do so." And Mahmood, J., expressed his concurrence. I do not think this case is very helpful.

The next case which I have been able to discover is Janki Das v. Sandal (4). That case was similar to the case before us in its facts. There too, houses of an agriculturist were mortgaged and no exception was taken by the mortgagor in the suit on the mortgage that the houses were not capable of transfer. It was only when the decree was put into execution that the judgment-debtor urged, for the first time, that he, being an agriculturist, the houses were not liable to attachment and sale. The learned Judges (Sir George Knox and Mr. Justice Karamat Husain) held:

"We have been referred to no authority which lays down that houses of agriculturists are property which cannot by law be transferred. Section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon which reliance is placed refers to houses of agriculturists and enacts that in execution of a money-decree such houses are as a rule not capable of attachment or sale." It seems to me that in this sentence which I have italicized the learned Judges begged the question before us when they say that section 60 enacts that in execution of a money decree such houses cannot be sold, and this is the ratio decidendi of the case.

The next case is Ram Dial v. Narpat Singh (5). In that case an occupancy tenant mortgaged a grove, which was on his occupancy holding, and a house appurtenant to such holding. It was there held by Sir John Stanley, C.J. and Banerji, J., that under section 20 (2) of the Agra Tenancy Act, 1901, and section 266 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1882, respectively, neither the grove nor the house could be sold in execution of a decree on the mortgage.

The next case to which we need refer is the Full Bench case of Bhola Nath v. Kishori (6), where the same question again came up for decision. Sir Henry Richards, C. J. and Mr. Justice Tudball held that section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not operate to bar the sale of a house belonging to an agriculturist in execution of a decree on a mortgage of the same if such house is not an appurtenance of the mortgagor's holding which he is prohibited by law from mortgaging or transferring. Mr. Justice Banerji dissented. I have some doubt how far this case really applies, having regard to the observations of the Chief Justice.

Sir Henry Richards says: "The argument on behalf of the respondents is that by virtue of the proviso (to section 60) the house of the defendants cannot be sold and that, inasmuch as the house cannot be sold in execution of the decree, no mortgage decree ought to be made. On the other hand the appellant argues that section 60 does not apply to mortgage decrees at all, that it deals entirely with attachment and sale in respect of simple money decrees."

He goes on to hold:

Prima facie a man is entitled to mortgage his property if he pleases; and if he can make a valid mortgage, the mortgagee is entitled to a mortgage decree entitling him to sell the property.

With great respect it seems to me that this argument does not entirely meet the case. It does not answer the objection that in spite of a contract, the Legislature has ruled that the contract shall not be enforced by sale of the mortgaged house.

(2) (1879) 4 Bom. 95.

(4) (1911) 9 I.C. 825.
(5) (1911) 33 All. 136.
(6) (1912) 34 All. 25.

I also cannot agree with the rest of the judgment in which it is held that section 60 applies only to the execution of simple money decrees. It seems to me that the dissentient judgment of Mr. Justice Banerji is unanswerable and I wish to adopt it in its entirety as the basis of my decision in this case. As he says when dealing with the point as to whether section 60 applies only to simple money decrees, "At the commencement of the section the word 'and' is used and in the proviso we find the word 'or'. The proviso, as I understand it, forbids both attachment and sale, that is to say, where an attachment must precede a sale, it forbids attachment as well as sale and where it is not necessary that an attachment should be a preliminary step to a sale, it forbids sale . . . . . The object of the legislature is manifest. That object is that certain classes of debtors should be protected against their own improvidence. There can be no doubt that in the case of a simple decree for money the dwelling house occupied by an agriculturist cannot be sold. The policy of the law is that he should not be deprived of his place of residence by a process of Court. I fail to see why, if an unsecured creditor of the agriculturist cannot proceed against the debtor's dwelling house, a secured creditor should be allowed to do so. The policy of the law equally applies to both the cases."

The last case to which reference need be made is the case of Niadar Singh v. Sabit Khan (7). This is the case on which the lower Court based its decision.

There the question was whether the house of an agriculturist, which has been found to be appurtenant to his agricultural holding, is liable to sale in execution of a decree obtained upon a mortgage of the house made by the agriculturist. The appeal came first before Sir George Knox sitting alone, and he remanded it for finding as to whether the house was in the occupation of an agriculturist and on the finding being returned in the affirmative, he dismissed the appeal holding that section 60 (c) barred the sale in execution. From that decision there was an appeal under the Letters Patent which was heard by Sir P. C. Banerji and Mr. Justice Rafique and they, after referring to the decision already quoted in Bhola Nath v. Musammat Kishori (6), held that the provisions of section 60 (c) applied and dismissed the appeal. It seems to me, therefore, that the weight of authority, in this Court at any rate, is in favour of the view taken by the Court below.

The provisions of section 60 (c) of the present Code were certainly in existence in 1877—before the Transfer of Property Act came into being: see Act X of 1877, section 266. All that was done when the present Code was passed was to transfer the rules governing suits on mortgages from the Transfer of Property Act to the Code; that is to say, the sections relating to suits on mortgages (where such suits were necessary, i.e., subject to mortgages included in section 69) which were contained in section 85 and following sections, (being really rules of procedure), were cut out of the Transfer of Property Act, and were reproduced, with such modifications and amendments as seemed then necessary, and consolidated in Order 34. The law has not been materially altered, the only real alteration has been in the volume of the statute law, in which it is to be found, i.e., in Act No. V of 1908, instead of in Act No. IV of 1882. It seems to me, therefore, that this reshuffling of the sections in the statutes does not help interpreting the meaning of the old section 266 of Act X of 1877 which is still in force.

I much regret I cannot agree with either of my learned brothers. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

Mukerji, J.:—This case has been referred to a Bench of three Judges, because of a conflict of opinion existing between two cases, each decided by a Bench of two Judges. These cases are:—Janki Das v. Sandal (4) and Niadar Singh v. Sabit Khan (7). The question formulated for decision has not been put down in the form of a question. But it may be put down thus:—"Whether a judgment-debtor can raise the plea, in the execution department that he is an agriculturist and the houses occupied by him cannot be sold having regard to the provisions of section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code although the decree is one of mortgage and orders specifically the sale of such houses?"

In the referring order, there is an inaccuracy. It has been stated that the judgment-debtor also pleaded that his houses were appurtenant to his holding. As a matter of fact, he did not raise any such plea in his objection. He was unsuccessful in the Court of first instance, and he filed an appeal. In the grounds of appeal too he did not say that the houses were an appurtenance to his holding. The expression, viz., "the houses were appurtenant to the holding" appears in the judgments of the lower Courts and was probably due to a confusion of ideas. When a landholder sues a tenant for his ejectment from his dwelling house in the village in which he cultivates lands the tenant often takes the plea that the house is an appurtenance to the holding and, so long as he cultivates lands in the village, he cannot be ejected. In such cases alone, the question arises whether the house is or is not an appurtenance to the holding. It will be noticed that in section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code, clause (c), the property exempted is 'the houses and other buildings; . . . . . belonging to an agriculturist and occupied by him.' Nothing is said about the house or the building being an appurtenance of his holding.

Referring to the Tenancy Act, it will be seen that a holding is a parcel or parcels of land held for agricultural purposes. The prohibition is against the sale of such lands. A house or building is not land let for an agricultural purpose and cannot form a holding. Therefore, the question of its transferability or otherwise must be determined with reference only to section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code.

To go back to the question for decision. This question resolves itself into two portions. The first question is "whether, the Court executing the decree can go behind the express orders of the decree, by which the property has been ordered to be sold?" The second question is "whether, on a proper construction of section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code, the sale of an agriculturist's house (the expression is used for the sake of brevity), not in execution of a simple money decree, in which a previous attachment is necessary, but in execution of a mortgage decree, which has been passed on foot of a contract of mortgage specifically making the property a security for the debt, is prohibited?"

On the first question. The decree passed may be a right decree or it may be a wrong decree. A decree may be one that ignores the rules of law; yet, so long as it stands unreversed in appeal or revision, it is a good and binding decree between the parties, and the Court executing it cannot go behind its terms and say that the decree should not have been passed and the Court will not execute it as it stands. This decree may be one passed on contest or may have been passed ex parte, without the defendant appearing to show that the claim of the plaintiff was one that could not at all succeed. In the latter case, the defendant cannot come and say in the execution department that he will show that the decree is a wrong one. He will be estopped on foot of the judgment from raising any such contention and this will be so although the question sought to be raised in the execution department was never raised and decided before the decree was made. Take the case of a joint Hindu family. A father makes a mortgage without any legal necessity. In the suit against the father and the sons, the latter do not take any exception to the mortgage and a decree for sale is made ex parte. When the property is brought to sale in execution of the decree, the sons will not be allowed to show that the mortgage was unauthorised and could not be enforced against the property. Thus the facts which would vitiate the mortgage, although they may exist without any doubt, will not be allowed to be brought before the Court. Similarly, a suit may be on the face of the plaint barred by limitation. But if a Court overlooks this fact, and makes an ex parte decree, the defendant cannot, in the execution department, show that such was the case. That an ex parte decree may operate as res judicata was held in Ganga Bishen v. Mehar Ilahi (8). In the present case, the question whether the house ordered to be sold by the decree is or is not the property of an agriculturist is one of fact and has to be proved before the Court, by evidence, before the Court can accept it. Assuming that such a property is not saleable in execution of a decree, the facts necessary to be established were never alleged before the Court making the decree, much less were they proved. If those facts had been proved, the Court could have and ought to have (according to our assumption) said that the property could not be sold in execution of a decree and that it was not going to make a decree which could have no force in law. But these facts were never brought to the notice of the Court, the nature of the property was not established before it, and in ignorance of the facts it orders the property to be sold. Why should then, in this particular case, the judgment-debtor be allowed to show by adducing evidence that the nature of the property was such that it could not be sold in execution of a decree?

This question was specifically raised in this Court in the case of Katwari v. Sitaram (1) (which was a case under the Agra Tenancy Act and in which the fact involved, i.e., the nature of the property to be sold was an admitted fact, being recorded in the sale-deed), and the answer given was that it was the duty of the Court to obey the law and follow its directions. But the law can be applied only when the proper facts are allowed to be brought before the Court. If in the case of a mortgage of a joint family property, (in the case given as illustration) the sons may not show the nature of the property in the execution department, the respondent too, in this case, cannot adduce evidence to show the nature of the property. I would, therefore, hold that, in the execution department, this objection cannot be raised, in the teeth of the mortgage decree.

Now on the second question. It must be conceded that there is no rule of law which declares that the transfer (otherwise than in execution of a decree, as is said to be embodied in the section under discussion) of an agriculturist's house to be illegal. Under section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act, all properties except those enumerated there and those the transfer of which is expressly prohibited by law are declared to be transferable. For example, if there be an agreement between an agriculturist and a third person for the sale of the former's house and if the latter should sue for the specific performance of the contract the Courts would be bound to recognise the contract and to enforce it. As the result of the enforcement of the contract, the promisee will get possession through the Court, for there is no rule of law which lays down that delivery of possession over an agriculturist's house in execution of a decree is prohibited. If then the sale by private contract be not prohibited and may be even specifically enforced in a Court of law, we have to find out if a lesser contract, viz., that of mortgage, is prohibited and cannot be specifically enforced. For such a proposition of law, there must be a very clear authority and any rule of law that may only by implication be read as leading to this conclusion cannot be accepted as laying down such an anomaly.

The question then is: "Does section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code contain any such clear rule as would lead to the conclusion that a property otherwise transferable may not be subjected to a transfer even with the consent of the owner of the property simply because the agency of the Court has to be employed?"

Section 60 appears under the head "attachment." If we refer to section 51 of the Code, we shall see that several modes of execution are enumerated there. These are, briefly, (a) delivery of possession, (b) attachment and sale or sale without attachment, (c) arrest of the judgment-debtor and two other modes. Sections 55 to 64 come under the head "attachment" and sections 65 to 67 come under the head "sale". Thus section 60 comes under the head of attachment. It does not require the quoting of any authority to maintain the proposition that no property may be sold in execution of a simple money decree unless the same has been attached previously, so as to bring the same within the control as it were of the Court. In the case of a sale under a mortgage decree, no attachment is necessary for the decree, the order of the Court itself, having directed that that property is to be sold. In the execution of a decree for money every attachment is not followed by sale. For example, when a money decree is attached in the execution of another money decree, the attached decree is not sold, but the attached decree is executed and the money realised is applied to the satisfaction of the attaching decree. Similarly, when the pay of a Government servant is attached there is no sale. Only the officer charged with the disbursement of the pay is ordered to deduct a sum month by month and to pay the same towards the satisfaction of the decree. Thus a sale may or may not follow an attachment.

Bearing these rules in our mind, let us now read section 60 of the Code. I have already said it appears under the head 'attachment.' There is another head bearing the title of 'sale.' Under the circumstances, there is no reason to think that, in dealing with the subject of 'attachment' the writer had in his mind the cases of sales that are not preceded by attachment. Of course, if the language employed should leave no other alternative possible, that is another matter. Section 60, in sub-section (1), lays down, in effect, that all properties over which the judgment-debtor has a disposing power will be liable to attachment and sale. I have already pointed out that all properties are not sold in execution of a decree although they may have been subjected to an attachment. The words 'attachment and sale,' therefore, can only mean, 'attachment and sale where the sale is necessary after the attachment.' Otherwise there will be no consistency in the rules. That this is the meaning to be attached to the words 'attachment and sale' is clear from the proviso that follows the sub-section (1). It provides against 'such attachment or sale' in the case of certain 'particulars.' The use of the word 'such' is important. It, in my opinion, qualifies both the words 'attachment' and 'sale.' The proviso will thus read like this: "Provided that, the following particulars shall not be liable to such attachment or, where necessary, such sale as has been mentioned above in the main section." To my mind it is impossible to read the word 'sale' in the proviso as meaning 'sale with or without previous attachment,' without doing violence to the language of the section. Something might have been said in support of this reading, if the word 'such' had not been there. There is no possible warrant for confining the adjective 'such' to the word 'attachment' alone, for both the words 'attachment' and 'sale' occur in the main section. Among the particulars mentioned in the proviso there are items which are never sold after attachment, see, for example, clause (i), dealing with the salary of a public officer. In this case, only an attachment is necessary and no sale. Hence in the proviso, the word 'or' has been rightly used. One essential difference in principle between a sale held after attachment and a sale held in pursuance of a contract for sale is this that, in the former case, the sale is held against the wishes of the debtor. The Court is asked to raise money by the best possible means, and it has been vested with the authority to say that it would not act heartlessly and, in order to make the debtor pay, it would not make him absolutely destitute. In the case of a mortgage or hypothecation the debtor has agreed that a particular property might be taken as the security; so, the execution of the decree is held with his consent as it were. There is, therefore, no reason to suppose that a rule of law that talks of attachment and sale in the same breath as it were was really intended to cover a case of a sale with the consent of the debtor.

It is not always a valid mode of reading the new law, to compare it with the old one. Still in cases of doubt the old rule may be looked into. In the old Code also, the language used is the same as in the new Code. The old section is 266 and it, like the new section 60, appears under the head of attachment. The head is "F.—Of attachment of property." Sections 266 to 285 deal with cases and modes of attachment. The next head is "G.—Of sale and delivery of property."—This head 'G' is divided into three sub-heads. Sub-head (a) deals with 'General rules' and consists of sections 286 to 295. Sub-head (b) deals with 'Rules as to moveable property' and consists of sections 296 to 303. Sub-head (c) deals with 'Rules as to immoveable property' and consists of sections 304 to 327. It will thus be seen that, under the old Code, the rules as to the sale of property, moveable and immoveable, were distinctly kept separate from the rules as to attachment and yet in the general section, about attachment (section 266) the same language was used as in the case of section 60 of the new Code. The new Code having been split up into two portions, fewer sections appear in the body of the Code under the heads "Attachment, etc," than in the older Code. The inference is then clear, viz., the rules in section 60 deal with sales held in execution of decrees in which a previous attachment is necessay, i.e., to sales held in execution of simple money decrees.

I will now consider the authorities. In Bhagwandas v. Hathibhai (2), it was held that the rule as to attachment and consequent sale did not apply to a sale held in pursuance of a mortgage decree. This was in 1879, but the language of the law was the same in the Code of 1877 as in the Code of 1882. In the case of Ramdayal v. Narpat (5), Stanley, C.J., and Banerji, J., took the view that even where a house of an agriculturist was mortgaged, it could not be ordered to be sold, in view of the provisions of section 269 of the old Code and section 60 of the new one. It will be noticed that one of the grounds for the actual decision of the case was that the mortgagor was a tenant and had mortgaged not only his house but also his holding, and the house might be looked upon as an appurtenance to the holding. The decision cannot, therefore, be looked upon as given solely on a consideration of the law as contained in the Civil Procedure Code. There is one more point to be noticed. The point was decided in the suit itself, and it is no authority for the proposition that the point may be raised even after a decree for sale had been made.

In the case of Bhola Nath v. Kishori (6) Richards, C. J., and Tudball, J., held very clearly that section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code applied only to the case of an execution of a simple money decree. Banerji, J., dissented and did not think it necessary to change his opinion expressed in the case Ram Dayal v. Narpat (5). I have given my reasons for holding the opinion that I have expressed, and I do not propose discussing the opinion given by the learned Judges in the several cases. The arguments are clear on both sides. The only question is which arguments appeal to a particular Judge. I will draw attention to the fact that in this case also the question rose before the decree and not after it had been made.

In Salamat v. Lukkhi (9), it was held that although a right to an allowance might not be attachable in execution of a simple money decree, having regard to the provisions of section 266 of the Civil Procedure Code, it did not lie in the mouth of the judgment-debtor, who had mortgaged the same, to urge that it could not be sold.

I have not been able to lay my hand over any other cases bearing directly on the point under consideration. The two cases, which led to this reference took opposite views. The case of Janki Dass v. Sandal (4), was decided by Knox and Karamat Husain, JJ. The case of Niadar v. Sabit, (7) was decided by Banerji and Rafique, JJ., who upheld Knox, J. It will thus be seen that the opinion in this Court is very much divided. Stanley, C. J. and Benerji and Rafique, JJ., took the view opposed to mine, and Richards, C. J. and Tudball and Karamat Husain, JJ., took the same view as taken by me. Knox, J., did not always stick to his view. But all this is on the second point.

The case of Katwari v. Sitaram (1) already referred to was decided on an interpretation of section 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act and is not directly relevant on the question before us.

I am accordingly of opinion that an agriculturist may make a valid mortgage of his house, there being nothing in section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code to the contrary, and that after a decree for the sale of it has been made on foot of a mortgage, it may be sold in execution of the decree and the judgment-debtor is not entitled to raise the point in the execution department.

Walsh, J.:—Two questions are involved in this reference. The first is: Whethre the exemptions from attachment and sale in execution of a decree contained in the proviso to section 60 of the Code apply to a mortgagee's decree for sale.

I have had the advantage of studying the judgments of my two brothers. They fully cover the ground and it is not necessary to do so again. They differ fundamentally, and each judgment appears on the face of it to be unanswerable.

On the one hand, the section distinctly prohibits the sale of this property in execution of a decree. On the other hand, as Mr. Justice Mukerji's judgment shows, there is much in the section which is inappropriate to a mortgagee's decree for sale.

Where a section, or an Act, is capable of two renderings or is said to mean less, or more, than it says, it is a maxim of interpretation that one must look at the scope and object of the enactment. For this purpose, it is helpful to recall the history.

The rights of a mortgagor have always been the special care of Courts of equity. The equity of redemption was jealously guarded and could not be sold without an order of the Court and without the mortgagee in possession rendering an account. The codified law in India sought to give effect to the established principles of the English Courts for enforcing a mortgage security by the now repealed sections of the Transfer of Property Act. Great controversy having arisen as to the applicability of the provisions of the Code to the enforcement of a mortgagee's decree for sale, it was decided, when the Code was amended in 1908, that this part of the Transfer of Property Act relating to mortgagee's suits for sale, being a question of procedure, should be incorporated in the Code. This was effected by the present Order 34.

(9) (1884) 10 Cal. 521.

The mortgagee's right of sale is carefully hedged round by provisions which are familiar and which have no place in the execution of an ordinary money decree. For example, the preliminary decree still gives the mortgagor a period within which he may redeem. The Courts never allowed the sale of the bare equity of redemption under a judgment on the covenant. In other words, the mortgagee cannot have execution against the mortgaged property under a decree for the simple mortgage debt. This provision is preserved in Order 34, rule 14. The mortgagee is not to be allowed to bring the mortgaged property to sale, "otherwise than by instituting a suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage." There is nothing illegal in a covenant for sale, as section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act shows. But the question before us relates to the enforcement by the Court. The change introduced into Order 34, rule 14, as opposed to section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act which it replaced, is significant. The mortgagee was under the old law prohibited from bringing the mortgaged property to sale, in satisfaction of a claim, "whether arising under the mortgage or not." But it was always competent for the mortgagee to purchase the equity by an agreement subsequent to, and independent of, the mortgage transaction. There was, therefore, no good reason why he should not be allowed to sell it in satisfaction of a claim unconnected with the mortgage. So the new Code dropped the old form of words, and reduced the prohibition to claims "arising under the mortgage." The important point is that the prohibition is found not in that part of the Code which relates generally to execution, but in that which deals particularly with the enforcement of mortgage decrees. All this shows that, by the scheme of the present Code, execution and the enforcement of mortgage decrees, are mutually exclusive, at any rate where inconsistent.

I am doubtful whether according to the strictly juristic view, the sale of mortgaged property under a mortgagee's decree for sale is really "execution" at all. It is satisfaction of the decree. When a creditor obtains a decree for a debt, and the debtor pays after the decree, the decree is satisfied, not executed. If the debtor does not pay, the law executes the decree, if it can, by realizing the amount out of any available property of the debtor which it attaches and sells. In the case of a mortgage decree, the property ordered to be sold is not something which is compulsorily substituted for the obligation contained in the contract, and carried forward into the decree. It is the obligation itself. The sale is the satisfaction of the contract and of the decree. Sir Comer Petheram took this view in the course of a judgment reported in I. L. R. 14 C. 668 (1887) where he spoke of the decree being one "for specific performance of the contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee." The view, namely, that such a sale is not the execution of a decree derives support, though no authority, from the original intention of the jurists who framed the present Code, in dealing with the general provisions relating to execution which begin with section 36, to emphasise the dichotomy by defining the territorial jurisdictions of "the Court executing a decree," only to the extent which it was competent to pass a decree, and of "the Court which passed a decree for the enforcement of a mortgage," selling the mortgage property wherever situate.

I agree with Mr. Justice Lal Gopal Mukerji that the use of the word "such" removes the distributive force which the word "or" in "attachment or sale" would otherwise have. It must mean "attachment or sale in execution of a decree." And for the reasons given above, I have come to the conclusion that a sale under a mortgagee's decree is not a sale in execution of a decree and that, therefore, the proviso does not apply. This is not to say that the procedure is not, after decree, for the execution side. Any question which may arise relates to "the satisfaction of the decree," and is, therefore, within section 47.

I was throughout pressed by the contention that under the law thus interpreted a mortgagee can sell this property, whereas a simple decree-holder cannot, and that such a result is illogical, and against the policy of the Legislature. In other words, to quote the dissenting judgment of Mr. Justice Banerji in I. L. R. 34 A. 25, the object was "to protect people against their own improvidence." These speculations are dangerous, and are apt to attribute more consistency and foresight to the Legislature than is usually found in fact. But, in truth, there is no lack of justification for the law as I understand it. An unsecured creditor who chooses to give credit to a poor man who has no credit, and no property beyond the bare instruments with which he ekes out his livelihood, has only himself to thank and cannot complain if the law steps in to prevent him from selling up his debtor completely for a debt in respect of which he took an obvious risk. But a creditor who has taken security is in a different position. It may be assumed that he would not have advanced the money at all unless he was given the security, and the debtor has voluntarily agreed to part with the property, with his eyes open and knowing the consequences.

It seems to follow from the reasons which I have given above on the first question, that I agree with Mr. Justice Ryves that the point is one which is properly taken in execution. I think it matters very little. The Court is often the same. I don't know how the point could be pleaded in defence to the mortgagee's suit. As Mr. Justice Mukerji points out, the mortgage is not prohibited or illegal. If raised in the suit, the Judge might well say that the objection was premature at that stage, and reserve it for the post decree proceedings. It is an objection to enforcement of the decree when made, the decree being unobjectionable. In a word, the objection presupposes a valid decree. If the mortgagor has no saleable interest that is a matter which concerns the purchaser, who acquires no greater interest than is saleable.

It is to be hoped that this view, although arrived at by a bare majority of the Court, will be accepted as final, as there has hitherto been great diversity of judicial decision.

Order of Courts :—The order is that the appeal is allowed, and the objection dismissed, and the order of first Court restored.

Appeal allowed.

* Crl. Rev. No. 681 of 1923, decided on 24-1-1924, against the Order of Sessions udge, Saharanpur, dated 27-9-1923.

Public Gambling Act, S. 3—Amendment Act I of 1917, S. 2—Balls of paper used in Satta betting being so manipulated as to leave no chance of loss to the owner are instruments of gaming and offence is committed.

Where by the use of balls of paper the accused so manipulated the conditions of the game that he could not possibly lose, held, that the offence of keeping a public gaming house was committed. The words "used for the benefit or gain of the person owning the house" require strict proof by the prosecution who must show that the owner or occupier takes a fixed commission irrespective of the result or so manipulates the conditions that he cannot possibly lose. Judgment :—Atma Ram was convicted by the District Magistrate of Debra Dun under section 3 of the Public Gambling Act (Act No. III of 1867) as amended by Act I of 1917 of the Local Legislature and sentenced to pay a fine. His appeal was dismissed by the learned Sessions Judge of Saharanpur. He then filed a revision in this Court on the ground that the conviction was untenable having regard to two recent decisions of this Court which will be referred to hereafter. The case has been referred to a Full Bench. The order of reference is as follows:—"Having regard to the very singular form in which "common gaming house" has been defined and to the decisions in Lachhi Ram v. Emperor (1) and Durga Prasad v. Emperor (2), I think it desirable to appoint a Full Bench to consider whether on a fair construction of the words "used for the profit or gain of the person owning", the acts done by Atma Ram are sufficient to support the conviction or whether the language of the definition is inapt and insufficient."

The judgment of the trial Court is somewhat involved and it is not easy to find from it what are the real facts of the case. After a careful examination of the judgment on appeal and the evidence on the record it is possible to arrive at a conclusion as to what the facts actually were. Once these facts are ascertained we have no hesitation in holding that the conviction was justified.

The law regulating public gambling in these provinces was Act No. III of 1867 and it proved for nearly 50 years to be adequate. In 1910, however, a new form of gambling came into fashion and rapidly increased in popularity. This was known as Satta gambling. The public were invited to guess what would be the last two digits or the last digit or the average price of a chest of opium at the monthly sale in Calcutta.

In the town of Agra, and subsequently, in the neighbouring western districts, this form of gambling came into such a vogue as to dislocate the daily life of a large number of artizans and the poor classes and caused much misery in their families, and led to an increase of crime. A somewhat similar form of gambling was also introduced later into Saharanpur, Moradabad and neighbouring districts. Instead of the price of opium, the average price of cotton in Bombay as telegraphed by a broker, was used for the purpose of betting and bets were made on the last digit or the last two digits.

If such betting was carried out in "a public place" the Act as it stood would suffice; but it was felt that if this form of gambling was carried on in a house or other place which could not be characterised as a public place, the Act as it stood would not apply. Act No. I of 1917 of the Local Legislature was passed in order to meet this new form of gambling, and the definition of "common gambling house" as it stood in the old Act was modified. Under the new Act it was provided by section 2 that "Gaming" "includes wagering or betting, except wagering or betting upon a horse-race, when such wagering or betting takes place,

(a) on the day on which such race is to be run, and

(b) in an enclosure which the stewards controlling such race have, with the sanction of the Local Government, set apart for the purpose, but does not include a lottery;

'Instruments of gaming' include any article used as a means or appurtenance of, or for the purpose of carrying on or facilitating, gaming;

'Common gaming-house' means any house, room, tent, or walled enclosure or space, or vehicle, or vessel, or any place whatsoever, in which any instruments of gaming are kept or used for the profit or gain of the person owning, occupying, using or keeping such house, room, tent, enclosure, space, vehicle, vessel or place, whether by way of charge for the use of such house, room, tent, enclosure, space, vehicle, vessel, place or instruments or otherwise howsoever".

The difficulty in this case arises from the words "instruments of gaming kept or used for the profit or gain of the person owning, etc".

In these cases of Satta gambling often the only tangible evidence that gaming had been going on was the discovery of memoranda of bets made, whether these were kept in books or on loose pieces of paper.

The first case in this Court in which these words were considered, was Raghunath v. Emperor (3). That was a case of Satta gambling on the sale of opium. When the house was raided some slips of paper were found with writing on them which were supposed to be memoranda of bets made. There was some argument as to whether these memoranda really recorded bets. Mr. Justice Banerji however held as follows:—

"Having regard however to the nature of the papers, it may be assumed that they related to gambling. In order, however, to sustain the conviction of Raghunath for keeping a common gambling house, it was necessary for the prosecution to prove not only that he owned the house, or was the occupier of it, and that instruments of gambling were kept or used in it, but that they were kept or used for the profit or gain of Raghunath. There is not a particle of evidence to show that he made any profit or gain out of the transactions which might have taken place in his house. It is possible that he made some profit but in the absence of evidence to show that profit or gain was made he could not be convicted merely upon suspicion. Therefore in my opinion his conviction for keeping a common gaming house as defined in Act I of 1917 cannot be sustained."

That decision was given on the 23rd of May, 1918. The same point again came up before a single Judge of this Court on the 8th of February, 1922. There the facts were exactly similar to the facts in the last case. On this occasion on the search of the shop, a betting book was found in which the bets were recorded. The Judge was referred to the last case, but he had considerable doubts as to its correctness. He therefore referred it to a Bench of two

(3) (1918) 16 A.L.J. 760.

Judges for decision. In his order of reference after quoting Mr. Justice Banerji's decision he said :

"According to the case which I have already quoted, this fact would not in itself be enough (namely the finding of the betting book). There must be evidence to prove that Lachchi Ram kept this book for his profit or gain. It seems to me to be almost impossible to get any evidence aliunde. The presumption I should think was that he was not a philanthropist but was carrying on betting with at any rate the hope, if not for the purpose, of profit or gain."

The case was heard by a Bench of two Judges and their decision is reported in Lachchi Ram v. Emperor (1), and the view of Mr. Justice Banerji was reaffirmed. The learned Judges say :

"The definition of a common gaming house, in our opinion, is not materially different under the new Act from what it was under the old Act, with the exception that it is no longer necessary as an ingredient of the offence to establish playing by cards, dice, gaming tables or other articles of that nature. But the essential element remains. It must be established that the owner or occupier takes a fixed commission which is irrespective of the result of the gaming, or, at the outside, that he manipulates the conditions in such a manner that he cannot possibly lose."

It will thus be seen that although the views of all the Judges of this Court may not agree, three Judges have definitely ruled that the words "used for the profit or gain of the person owning the house" must be strictly proved by evidence.

This last case was recently considered by the High Court at Bombay in Emperor v. Dattatraya Shankar (4) and was dissented from. Sir Lallubhai Shah, Kt., Acting Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Bench said—

"I do not think that on a proper construction of the definition the prosecution can be restricted, for the purpose of proving that a particular house, room or place is a common gaming house, to the two alternatives mentioned in the case of Lachchi Ram v. Emperor (1). It is sufficient if the house is one in which instruments of gaming are kept or used for the profit or gain of the person keeping or using such place, i.e., where the person keeping or using the house knows that profit or gain will in all probability result from the use of the instruments of gaming. The profit or gain may not actually result from such use. But if profit or gain is the probable and expected result of the game itself and if that is the purpose of keeping or using the instruments, it would be sufficient, in my opinion, to bring the case within the scope of the definition. At the same time it is clear that the prosecution must establish that the purpose is profit or gain. This may be done either by showing that the owner was charging for use of the instruments of gaming or for the use of the house, room or place, or in any other manner that may be possible under the circumstances of the case, having regard to the nature of the game carried on in that house."

It seems to us that a very slight amendment in the wording of the section would remove all difficulties in future. The words now are "instruments of gaming are kept or used for the profit or gain of the person owning". If instead of the word "for" we substitute "with a view to" we think there can be no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to whether a given case falls within the section. The words would then be 'instruments of gaming are kept or used with a view to the profit or gain of the person owning."

The facts in the present case are as follows :—

Atma Ram wrote figures 1 to 100 on separate pieces of paper which he rolled up into a ball and placed in a jar which was then closed. At an appointed time in the afternoon, the jar was opened and three balls were taken out of it at random and the numbers found on them were added up. Persons who had correctly guessed the last digit received, it is said, nine times their stake, and those who correctly guessed the last two digits received 50 times. Bets were recorded up to the time of the opening of the jar. The three balls were then taken out, two of them were handed to the public and the third ball was retained by Atma Ram who read out the figure written on it. To take an example, the two balls given to the public bore figures 10 and 53. Atma Ram then having got before him a list of the bets chose such a figure as would best suit his "book." Thus in this case seeing that nobody had chosen 70 as the two last digits, he said that the number inscribed on the third piece of paper was seven making the total 70. He therefore won all the bets on the two figures and lost only on the single figure in the case of persons who had chosen zero. On this finding it is clear that the conviction of Atma Ram was right even under the restricted meaning given to the section in the case of Lachchi Ram.

But there is another aspect of the case which has not been noticed by the Courts below which is equally conclusive against Atma Ram. The Magistrate of the district had issued a warrant under the terms of section 5 of the Act and it was in accordance with that warrant that the premises were searched. When they were searched a jar containing these balls of paper was found. It is quite clear that these balls of paper were instruments of gaming. Without them the gaming could not possibly have been carried on. They are quite distinct from the slips of paper or books in which bets were entered Such slips were not necessary for the carrying on of the gaming but these balls of paper were. They were therefore implements of gaming found in a search duly authorised under the Act and therefore the provisions of section 6 apply. The finding of these balls in a jar in a house occupied by Atma Ram raises a presumption which he has not attempted to meet. On this ground alone the conviction would be justified.

We reject the application.

We direct that a copy of this judgment be transmitted to the Local Government for their consideration of the amendment of the Act suggested by us.

Application rejected.

On a suit to recover arrears of profits from the lambardar in the Revenue Court lambardar can question title in the co-sharer's transferee on the ground that his transferor had, at the date of the transfer, ceased to have any title to the profits by reason of his having been declared an insolvent.

Per Lindsay, J.—A plea based upon S. 28 of the Provincial Insolvency Act raises a question of substantive law and not merely of procedure. (Contra Sulaiman, J.). [P. 344, C. 1.]

Per Kanhaiya Lal, J.—A co-sharer whose name continues to be recorded in the revenue papers after his adjudication as an insolvent has a right to bring a suit to recover arrears of profits and can make a valid transfer of that right. By reason of S. 167 the profits recoverable by a co-sharer are not debts provable under the Insolvency Act and no Court other than a Revenue Court can take cognizance of a suit to recover the same. [P. 348, C. 1.]

Lindsay, J.:—This is a reference by the Local Government under rule 17 of the Rules and Orders relating to the Kumaun Division soliciting the opinion of the Court regarding two questions which were raised originally in a suit brought in the Court of the Assistant Collector, Kashipur, under the provisions of the Agra Tenancy Act.

The plaintiffs in that suit were Kunji Behari Lal and Har Kishen Das and the claim was for recovery of profits due in respect of a certain share in a mahal for the years 1324, 1325 and 1326 Fasli. According to the plaint the profits for these years became due on the 1st of August in each of the years 1917, 1918 and 1919. There were five defendants to the suit, the first of whom, Gobind Ram is the lambardar of the mahal. The fifth defendant was Gulab Singh one of the co-sharers.

The case for the plaintiffs, was that on the 26th July, 1920, they had taken from the 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th defendants an assignment of the profits for the years in suit. The fifth defendant Gulab Singh had assigned his right to the profits for all the three years; the second, third and fourth defendants had assigned the profits for 1325 and 1326 Fasli only.

The principal defendant was the lambardar (defendant No. 1) and among various pleas which he raised in defence we have to notice only two which have given rise to the two questions submitted to our decision. In para 8 of his written statement the lambardar alleged that on the date of the assignment in the plaintiffs favour, Gulab Singh, the 5th defendant was an insolvent and had no property or rights which he could transfer. It was pleaded therefore that the plaintiffs had no right to demand any share of profits on the basis of a transfer from Gulab Singh.

In the 17th para of the written statement the lambardar claimed a set off in virtue of decree for arrears of rent obtained by him against the 2nd, 3rd and 4th defendants.

With respect to the first of these pleas the Assistant Collector was of opinion that the defence taken was a good one and that by reason of the provisions of section 28 of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1920, Gulab Singh, having been adjudicated insolvent was not competent to transfer any property or right to property to the plaintiffs.

The other plea, relating to the set off, was rejected by him. He stated in his judgment that he could find no law in support of the defendant's claim to a set off.

The case next came before the Deputy Commissioner sitting as District Judge in appeal. In his order of remand he decided that Gulab Singh, though insolvent, could, in a Revenue Court, maintain a suit for profits and could therefore transfer his right to sue for those profits. This opinion was based upon the Full Bench decision of this Court in Kalka Das v. Gajju Singh, (1). The judgment of the first Court upon issue was therefore overuled.

The Deputy Commissioner (District Judge) agreed with the first Court in holding that there was no legal sanction for the adjustment of the defendant's claim by way of set off.

The decision of the first appellate Court on these two points has been affirmed in second appeal by the Commissioner of Kumaun as the Judge of the High Court of Kumaun.

In the letter of reference received from the Local Government the first question raised concerns the application of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1920 to suits and proceedings under the Tenancy Act. It is stated in para 2 of the Government's letter that the Government are advised that the ruling in 43 All. 510 was not directly applicable to the case inasmuch as it merely laid down that the Insolvency Act is no bar to a suit for arrears of rent brought by a zamindar pending proceedings in insolvency (i.e., against the tenant).' It is pointed out that the plea in the present case was that the property of the insolvent, Gulab Singh, having vested in the Court or the Receiver he had no rights left which he could transfer to the plaintiffs. The argument before the Courts below was not that the provisions of the Insolvency Act barred the suit but that the plaintiffs had acquired no valid title to the share of profits due to the insolvent.

As regards this question I am of opinion for the reasons about to be given, that the view taken by both the lower appellate Courts is erroneous and that the correct view was taken by the Court of first instance. Before proceeding to discuss this matter I may observe that it is nowhere stated in the record on what date the order of adjudication was made against Gulab Singh. From certain oral evidence given at the trial it would appear that the order was made about five years before the suit came to hearing. This is what Gulab Singh said himself. However, it seems clear on all hands that the adjudication order had been made prior to the date of the assignment, that is, prior to the 26th July 1920.

Now there can be no dispute that Gulab Singh is a person amenable to the provisions of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1920, and whether the adjudication order was made under that Act, or under the earlier Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907 the result was the same. All the property of the insolvent vested in the Court or the Receiver as soon as the order of adjudication was made (cf. section 28 (2) of the Act of 1920 and section 16 (2) of the Act of 1907). It follows therefore that from the date of the order Gulab Singh ceased to be a co-sharer. His share was taken away from him and became vested in the Court or the Receiver. The profits of his share which had already accrued due were similarly divested and any profits accruing due after the date of the order of adjudication also became vested in the Court or in the receiver (cf. section 28 sub-section (4) of the Act of 1920 and section 16, sub-section (4) of the Act of 1907). It is clear therefore that on the date of the assignment of his share of the profits for the three years in suit the insolvent had no interest in these profits which he could in law transfer to the plaintiffs.

For what reason then is it suggested or argued that the Revenue Court was debarred from taking cognizance of the provisions of the Insolvency laws just mentioned? The argument is that the answer to this question is to be found in section 193, clause (a) of the Agra Tenancy Act which it is said, forbids the entertainment of any plea based upon anything contained in the Provincial Insolvency Act, and compels the Revenue Court to ignore the special provisions of that Act, quoted above, by which on the passing of the order of adjudication the property of the insolvent is divested and is transferred to the Court or the Receiver.

In my opinion this argument is not sustainable.

Section 193 of the Tenancy Act is to be found in Chapter XIII of the Act which is a chapter relating to procedure.

The section itself begins with the declaration that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure shall apply to the procedure in all suits and other proceedings under the Act so far as they are not inconsistent therewith and subject to certain modifications and additions which are then set out in the attached clauses (a) to (m).

We are concerned for the present with clause (a) only which enunciates that certain chapters and provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure as it then stood (Act XIV of 1882) shall not apply "to any such suit or proceeding."

Chapter XX of the Civil Procedure Code, as it then was, contained the law relating to proceedings in insolvency. It was subsequently repealed by the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907 which in its turn, gave way to the similar enactment of 1920. It may be taken therefore that the reference in clause (a) of section 193 of the Tenancy Act must now be treated as a reference to the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1920, and that in consequence the procedure in all suits and proceedings under the Tenancy Act is not governed by the provisions of the Insolvency Act. But we are not dealing here with a question of pure procedure but with a question of substantive law.

The defendant Gobind Ram in raising the plea based upon section 28 of the Provincial Insolvency Act was not raising any question of procedure at all. He was not attacking the procedure of the plaintiffs in bringing or conducting the suit nor was he asking the Revenue Court to apply to the proceedings before it any rule of procedural law contained in the Insolvency Act. He was impugning the right of the plaintiffs to recover on the ground that they had taken nothing from Gulab Singh under his assignment in their favour and he based his plea on a provision of the Insolvency Act which enacts, not adjective but purely substantive law.

Indeed under the law of procedure which governs the conduct of business in the Revenue Courts Gobind Ram was under a legal obligation to raise this plea.

Order 8 of the Civil Procedure Code which relates to "Written Statement and set off" is in full force in the Revenue Courts except in so far as the provisions of rule 6 of that order are modified by clause (g) of the 193rd section of the Tenancy Act which imposes a restriction on the right of set off as allowed by rule 6. Rule 2 of Order 8 declares that the defendant must raise by his pleading all matters which show the suit not to be maintainable or that the transaction is either void or voidable in point of law.

Well, that is exactly what Gobind Ram was doing when he pleaded that the transaction upon which the plaintiffs were relying for their right of suit was a void transaction. He was pleading a rule of substantive law contained in section 28 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. He had every right to do so and indeed he was bound to do so and for myself I can discover no reason why, for anything contained in section 193, the Revenue Court was prohibited from entertaining and deciding the question so raised by him. To read the section as enforcing such a prohibition is to my mind sheer absurdity.

Section 193 of the Tenancy Act must be construed in the sense and for the purpose for which it was intended, namely the regulation of procedure in the Revenue Courts and it cannot in my opinion be extended so as to withdraw from the cognizance and determination of those Courts pleas which do not go to procedure but to substantive legal rights. With regard to the Full Bench decision relied upon by both the appellate Courts below (43 All. 510) it is to be observed that the only point which arose for decision was one of pure procedural law. The question was whether a landlord could, without the leave of the Insolvency Court, sue for arrears of rent a tenant against whom an order of adjudication had been made. Under an earlier decision of the Court (34 All. 121) it had been held that such a suit could not be brought without the leave of the Insolvency Court. The Full Bench decided, and if I may say so, decided correctly that the view taken in the earlier case was wrong. Section 16 (2) of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1907, which was the enactment then under consideration, and which corresponds with section 28 (2) of the present Act, laid down that no suit or other legal proceeding can be commenced by a creditor against the insolvent without the leave of the Court. That is a rule of pure procedure and must yield before the special provisions relating to procedure contained in section 193 of the Tenancy Act.

The question now before us, namely whether section 193 of that Act excludes the operation of substantive as well as adjective enactments in the insolvency law was not before the Full Bench and if there are any observations in the judgment which might be treated as supporting the view now contended for, namely that the law relating to the transfer of the property of the insolvent from the insolvent to the Court or the Receiver must be ignored by the Revenue Courts, then those observations were purely obiter and are not binding upon me.

My answer to the first of the questions propounded by the Local Government in this reference therefore is that the Full Bench ruling in I.L.R. 43 All. 510 was not applicable to the facts of this case; that Gobind Ram was entitled to raise the plea based upon section 28 (2) of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920; that the Revenue Court was competent to entertain the plea and to decide the issue raised upon it; and that the Court of first instance rightly decided that the plaintiffs could not succeed upon the basis of the fraudulent assignment made in their favour by the insolvent Gulab Singh.

The second question we have to answer relates to the first defendant's claim to a set off in respect of a certain decree for arrears of rent which he held against the 2nd, 3rd and 4th defendants.

There I think all the Courts were right though they give no reason for their opinion except by saying that they could find no legal sanction for the defendant's claim. For this part of the case we have to look to clause (g) of section 193 of the Tenancy Act which lays down that "no set off shall be allowed in any suit under this Act except a sum due to the defendant on an unsatisfied decree under this Act or under any enactment hereby repealed."

The clause does not say from whom the sum is due to the defendant, but presumably it is intended that it must be due from the plaintiff. It could hardly mean that the money was due from a third party.

The clause clearly cuts down the extent of the right of set off allowed in Order 8, rule 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In other words, the defendant in a suit in a Revenue Court cannot claim set-off "of any ascertained sum of money legally recoverable from the plaintiffs." He can only claim a set off in respect of a sum owing to him under an unsatisfied decree, obviously a decree obtained against the plaintiff. Now here, Gobind Ram, has no decree against the plaintiffs. He had never sued them at all. His decree had been got, not against the plaintiffs, but against three of the plaintiffs' assignors, namely the 2nd, 3rd and 4th defendants. He could not legally recover the amount of his decree from these plaintiffs who are merely the assignees of the rights of these defendants to recover a share of the profits for the years 1325 and 1326 F. It is quite clear therefore that under the law Gobind Ram was not entitled to the set off he claimed.

I answer the second question accordingly.

As it is, I understand the practice in these proceedings is to make a recommendation regarding the award of costs in this Court, I am of opinion that in view of the decision, at which I have arrived the parties should bear their own costs in this Court.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is a reference by the Local Government under rule 17 of the Rules and Orders relating to the Kumaun Division. The facts of this case are as follows:—

of a certain share in mahal Abi of mauza Babarkhera. They executed a lease of their mortgaged share in favour of Lal Singh ancestor of defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 and in favour of defendant No. 5, Gulab Singh. The lessees, not having paid their lease money and not having recovered their profits from the lambardar, executed two separate deeds of assignment of their shares of profits in July 1920. Under one deed the defendants 2, 3 and 4 transferred their profits for 1325 and 1326 fasli to the plaintiffs, and under the second deed the defendant No. 5, Gulab Singh, transferred his alleged share of profits for the years 1324, 1325 and 1326 fasli.

It is an admitted fact that before these deeds of assignment were executed Gulab Singh had been duly adjudicated an insolvent by the Civil Court. Unfortunately we have not been able to discover the exact date of the adjudication. Had it been the fact that Gulab Singh was adjudicated an insolvent before the profits for the years in dispute ever accured the case might have been simpler, but the arguments before us have proceeded on the assumption that Gulab Singh was adjudicated an insolvent after the profit had fallen due and before the deeds of assignment. And it is on this assumption that I propose to consider the questions involved in the reference.

The plaintiffs having obtained the deeds of assignment brought the suit, out of which this reference has arisen, for recovery of the profits for the years aforementioned as the assigns of the co-sharers, against the lambardar Govind Ram, defendant No. 1. The main pleas on behalf of the contesting defendant were: firstly that in view of Gulab Singh's adjudication the suit in part was not maintainable and secondly, that a certain decree for arrears of rent, which the lambardar held against the plaintiffs vendors and the defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4, should be set off.

The Assistant Collector, Mr. Za Ullah Khan, as the Court of first instance, held that in view of Gulab Singh's insolvency the sale of profits by him conferred no rights upon the transferees. He also held that there was no justification for allowing the set-off claimed. He, therefore framed a decree on this basis. An appeal was preferred by the defendant to the District Judge and Deputy Commissioner of Kumaun who agreed with the first Court on the question of there being no legal sanction for allowing a set-off but came to a contrary conclusion on the other point, and held that the Provincial Insolvency Act did not and could not apply to the suit under the Tenancy Act, and that, therefore, Gulab Singh though an insolvent could maintain a suit for profits and so could his transferees. He accordingly sent down a certain issue for a finding to be returned within a fixed time although in his order he called it "remanding the suit". On the findings being returned the decree of the Court of first instance was modified. On a further appeal before the Judge, Kumaun High Court, the learned Judge agreed with the conclusions of the Deputy Commissioner holding that no set-off was allowable under the Tenancy Act and that the fact of insolvency cannot affect the provisions of the Tenancy Act and that therefore the assignment of profits was valid. The local Government not being satisfied with this decree have referred the case to the High Court for opinion.

At the time of the arguments it was not clearly known whether Gulab Singh or the lessees were recorded as co-sharers in the revenue papers for the years in suit. Accordingly no question was raised at the bar as to there being any absolute presumption under section 201 of the Agra Tenancy Act in favour of the proprietary right of Gulab Singh, nor was it argued that such a presumption can be extended in favour of his assigns.

Even assuming that Gulab Singh's name was recorded, but that the names of the present plaintiffs were not recorded, I fail to see how any absolute presumption under section 201 clause (3) of the Agra Tenancy Act can arise. The word used in that clause is "plaintiff" and not plaintiff's predecessors. When the plaintiffs themselves are not recorded as having the proprietary right entitling them to institute the suit, the defendant can ask the Court either to refer the plaintiffs to the Civil Court or to try the question of title itself.

Chapter XIII of the Agra Tenancy Act deals with procedure. Section 193 in that Chapter makes the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable to the procedure in all suits and other proceedings under that Act so far as they are not inconsistent therewith subject to a few modifications and additions. Under sub-clause (a) it is provided that, Chapter XX of the old Code of Civil Procedure, Act XIV of 1882, which dealt with insolvent judgment-debtors, shall not apply to any such suit or proceeding. But, as I shall show later on, even this exception is not of general application. Chapter XX of the old Code was repealed by Act III of 1907 and section 56 of the latter Act provided that where, in any enactment in force at the date of the commencement of the Act, reference is made to Chapter XX of the Code of 1877 or of 1882 or to any section of either of these Chapters such a reference shall, so far as may be practicable, be construed as applying to this Act or to the corresponding section thereof. When after this Act, the new Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908) was enacted the provisions relating to the insolvent judgment-debtors were naturally omitted. Since then the new Provincial Insolvency Act (Act V of 1920) has come into force and section 83 contains a similar provision as section 56 of the previous Insolvency Act. The principal question in the present case therefore is as to how far the provisions of the Insolvency Act can, if at all, be applicable to cases arising under the Tenancy Act.

Section 28 (2) of Act V of 1920 which corresponds to section 16 (2) of Act III of 1907 provides that, on the making of an order of adjudication the whole of the property of the insolvent shall vest in the Court or in a Receiver as therein provided, and shall become divisible among the creditors. The learned advocate for the defendant contends that this provision is one of substantive law and not of a mere procedure, and that the Agra Tenancy Act does not prevent the applicability of a rule of substantive law. I am not prepared to say that the question can be disposed of on this short ground. Provisions regarding Insolvent judgment-debtors were contained in the Civil Procedure Codes of 1877 and of 1882, both of which ostensibly embody rules of procedure. After all the Insolvency Act merely regulates the method by which the claims of the creditors of an insolvent are to be satisfied. The object of the Act is to protect the insolvent from unnecessary harassment and imprisonment as well as to protect his creditors from being defrauded. It is true that property, by operation of law, vests in the Court or the Receiver, as the case may be, but it does only for the purpose of prescribing a mode by which the assets of the insolvent, are to be divided among the creditors, and the balance if any is to go to the insolvent on his discharge. Section 28, sub-clause (2), goes on to regulate the way in which creditors of the insolvent can pursue their remedy in respect of their debts. The rule contained in the latter portion of sub-clause (2) is obviously one of procedure. I am therefore not prepared to say that the first portion of sub-clause (2) contains a substantive law and the second portion an adjective law.

On the other hand the learned Advocate for the plaintiffs has relied strongly on the Full Bench case of this Court in Kalka Das v. Gaju Singh (1), and quoting remarks from page 512 has contended that "the Provincial Insolvency Act does not and cannot apply to any suit or proceeding under the Tenancy Act" and that "section 16 of the Insolvency Act cannot and does not apply to such suits". In the case before the Full Bench a suit for arrears of rent of an occupancy holding had been brought by the zamindar against the tenant. While the suit was pending the defendant was declared an insolvent. The plaintiff first impleaded the Receiver but on objection being raised by him his name was struck off. The defendant tenant however pleaded that the suit against him was not maintainable in view of the provisions of section 16, sub-clause (2) of Act III of 1907. The Courts below relying on the case of Raghubir Singh v. Ram Chander (2) acceded to that plea and dismissed the suit. The Full Bench held that the decision in Raghubir Singh v. Ram Chander (2) was incorrect and that the suit was maintainable. As the case had been disposed of on a preliminary ground it was remanded for disposal on the merits. Without laying down the broad proposition that the Provincial Insolvency Act does not and cannot apply to any suit or proceeding under the Tenancy Act the case could have been disposed of on the narrower ground that it was not open to the defendant to take shelter under section 16, sub-clause (2) of the Insolvency Act and plead that no creditor would have any remedy against him except with the leave of the Insolvency Court.

When a suit is brought by an insolvent plaintiff for arrears of profits it is certainly open to the defendant to plead that the plaintiff has no locus standi to maintain the suit, as by reason of his insolvency he has lost all rights to the amount claimed. When such a plea is raised, the defendant is not asking the Court to apply the Insolvency Act to the "suit" but to take account of the factum of the insolvency which took place before the suit was instituted. In an analogous case of an assignment under a registered document, when the defendant pleads that the plaintiff had transferred away his rights, can it be said that he is asking the Revenue Court to apply the Transfer of Property Act to the suit? Similarly if the plaintiff is an assign of the insolvent, the Revenue Court in taking cognizance of the fact of insolvency is merely holding that the title-deed relied upon by the plaintiff was a mere nullity and passed no rights to him.

The present suit can be disposed of on even a simpler and clearer ground, though that was not pressed before us in argument. Section 193 (a) of the Tenancy Act laid down an exception to the applicability of the old Code of Civil Procedure, but that exception itself is inapplicable to the present case. The plaintiffs not being recorded proprietors and the defendant having pleaded that neither they nor their vendor had any proprietary right, it was the duty of the Revenue Court under section 201 (1) to proceed, mutatis mutandis, as directed in section 199, provided that the party to be referred to the Civil Court should be the plaintiffs. Under section 199, the Court may either refer the party to the Civil Court, or determine the question of title itself. If the Revenue Court decides to determine such question of title itself, it shall follow the procedure laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure for the trial of suits, and "notwithstanding anything contained in section 193 of the Act, all the provisions of the said Code shall apply to the trial of such question of title". It is therefore quite clear that before the Provincial Insolvency Act was enacted, Chap. XX of the old Code of Civil Procedure was not inapplicable to a suit under Chap. XI of the Tenancy Act, when the plaintiff was not a recorded proprietor and the defendant denied his right and when the Revenue Court decided to determine the question of title itself. It follows that the Provincial Insolvency Act would also not be inapplicable to such a case.

The second question raised in the reference is capable of being disposed of very briefly. Both the Revenue Courts have thought that the Tenancy Act itself disallows such a set-off. This is not quite accurate. Under section 193 (g) it is provided that no set-off shall be allowed in any suit under this Act except a sum due to the defendant on an unsatisfied decree under this Act or under any enactment hereby repealed. The defendant lambardar holds an unsatisfied decree and at first sight it looks as if his case comes within the exception. But sub-clause (g) is only prohibitive and restrictive. In spite of a claim being allowable under the Code of Civil Procedure, the sub-clause provides that it shall not be allowed except when it is on account of an unsatisfied decree. This sub-clause does not mean that in the case of every unsatisfied decree a set off is necessarily allowable. We have therefore to go back to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and see whether the defendants' claim for the set-off could have been entertained. Under Order 8, rule 6 the defendant can claim to set-off against the plaintiff's demand any ascertained sum of money legally recoverable by him from the plaintiff. The defendant therefore cannot claim a set-off of a decree against the plaintiff's vendors. It has already been noted that the decree held by the lambardar for arrears of rents of which a set-off is claimed is against defendants 2, 3 and 4 only. Such a claim therefore could not have been entertained in the Revenue Court. The defendant's separate remedy is by way of execution of his decree against his judgment-debtors. I would therefore answer the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

Kanhaiya Lal, J. :—There are two questions raised by this reference. One of them is whether a co-sharer who has been adjudicated an insolvent has any right to assign the arrears of profits, which may fall due after his adjudication as an insolvent or in other words whether the assignee of the profits can sue the lambardar for the recovery of the same after such adjudication.

The plaintiff is an assignee from Gulab Singh of the arrears of the profits due for 1324, 1325 and 1326 Fasli. The evidence of Gulab Singh and the replies to the interrogatories, issued by the lambardar show that Gulab Singh was declared an insolvent sometime in 1323 Fasli. By virtue of section 16 (2) clause (a) of Act III of 1907, corresponding with section 28 of Act V of 1920, the property of Gulab Singh became vested in the Receiver or the Court when he was adjudicated an insolvent and but for section 201, clause (3) of the U. P. Tenancy Act, which permits a conclusive presumption of title to be raised in favour of the plaintiff, if his name is recorded in the Revenue papers, the insolvent would have had no rights left, which could entitle him to claim the subsequent profits or to assign the same to any person.

Section 164 of the U. P. Tenancy Act (II of 1901) lays down that a co-sharer may sue the lambardar for his share of the profits of a mahal or of any part thereof in the Revenue Court. Section 166 declares that the word co-sharer in the above section shall be deemed to include a legal representative and an assign of such person. The arrears of profits due by a lambardar to a co-sharer do not change their character as such arrears of profits by reason of the death of the co-sharer or of an assignment thereof; and section 167 forbids any Court other than a Court of Revenue from taking cognizance of any dispute or matter in respect of which a suit for profits might be brought in the Revenue Court. The arrears assigned cannot, therefore, be regarded as a debt recoverable in the Civil Court, and if in spite of the adjudication of insolvency, the effect of which was to divest the insolvent of his proprietary rights for the time being, the insolvent continued to be the recorded co-sharer, as the copy of the Jamabandi for 1324 Fasli filed shows, his status as a co-sharer and his right to sell the arrears as such co-sharer must be recognized.

It is obvious that had the suit been brought by Gulab Singh it could not have been contested by the Receiver, if any was appointed, for it is not suggested that he had obtained mutation of names in his favour. A co-sharer whose name continues to be recorded in the Revenue papers despite his adjudication as an insolvent has unquestionably a right to sue for the arrears of profits, due on account of his share; and if his right to sue and recover such arrears cannot be challenged by any person, he has also a right to sell the said arrears, for the right to sell is only a necessary corrollary of the right to sue. If an actionable claim is good and valid, it can be sold, unless it is in its nature non-transferable. If a right to sue subsists, a right to sell subsists too. Section 201, clause (3) of the N.W.P. Tenancy Act may in terms be inapplicable to the present plaintiff, but it can be used to determine the antecedent title of Gulab Singh or his right to sell the arrears due to him.

Section 193 of the U. P. Tenancy Act (II of 1901), moreover lays down that the procedure in all suits and other proceedings under that Act shall except as otherwise provided be regulated by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure excluding among other things Chapter XX and section 370 of Chapter XXI of the Code, which it declares, shall not apply to any such suit or proceeding. Chapter XX of the Civil Procedure Code then in force laid down the procedure regulating the adjudication of insolvency and the machinery to be employed for the realization of the assets of the insolvent for distribution among his creditors. That chapter was replaced by Act III of 1907, which has since been superseded by Act V of 1920. Section 370 of the old Code of Civil Procedure corresponded with Order 22, rule 8 of the new Code and empowered the Reciever to elect whether he would continue a suit filed by an insolvent before he was so adjudicated. By section 56, clause (27) of Act III of 1907 and section 83, clause (2) of Act V of 1920 it was provided that all references to the repealed provisions shall be deemed to have been made to the corresponding provisions of the Act, by which they were repealed. These provisions cannot therefore apply to suits and proceedings under the N.W.P. Tenancy Act except those referred to in section 199, clause (3) and section 201, clause (1) of that Act.

The law of Insolvency is mainly designed for the protection of creditors and the relief of debtors. The Receiver is only an officer appointed by the Court take charge of the assests of the insolvent for the time being and to hold the same for the benefit of the scheduled creditors till their debts are discharged. As in the case of any property attached by a Court in execution of a decree, the Court or the Receiver is a temporary custodian of the property of the insolvent for a specific purpose. Such rights as accrue to an attaching Court or to a Receiver are rights which the Court or Receiver acquires by operation of law in enforcement of the procedure laid down for the sale of the property attached or available for sale.

By section 193 (a) of the U.P. Tenancy Act the whole of the Insolvency law embodied in the Code of Civil Procedure or the corresponding Acts of the Legislature, has, however, been declared to be inapplicable to suits and proceedings under the U.P. Tenancy Act other than those referred to in section 199 clause (3) and section 201 clause (1) of the Act; and a Receiver is not even allowed to elect whether he is to continue a suit or proceeding so instituted by an insolvent prior to his adjudication as such. The result is that he cannot claim to be substituted for an insolvent in such a pending suit or proceeding on a suit or proceeding of that kind which may be subsequently filed by or against the insolvent in the Revenue Court under that Act or oust him from the rights and status conceded to him by the Act except by getting his name substituted in the Revenue papers for the time being in the place of the person adjudicated an insolvent under the U.P. Land Revenue Act (III of 1901), where such a substitution is legally permissible.

In Kalka Das v. Gajju Singh (1) where an occupancy tenant was declared an insolvent and a suit was filed for arrears of rent in respect of that holding against him and the Reciever, it was held that an occupancy tenant being outside the provisions of the Provincial Insolveny Act, that Act was no bar to a suit for arrears of rent brought by the Zamindar pending proceedings in insolvency, and it was pointed out that under section 56, clause (2) read with section 193, clause (a) of the U.P. Tenancy Act, the Provincial Insovency Act did not apply to any suit or proceeding under the Tenancy Act. The previous decision in Raghubir Singh v. Ramchandra (2) was overruled. In Parbati v. Raja Shiam Bakh (3) a similar view was taken. The substitution of the Receiver for the insolvent co-sharer for the purpose of enabling the former to realize the assets and pay the debts is a part of the machinery provided to secure a discharge of his liabilities, and though the Receiver acquires the rights of the insolvent for the time being for a specific purpose, the devolution is only a part of the procedure designed for realizing the object in view. In excluding the law of Insolvency from application to the Revenue Courts in suits and proceedings under the U.P. Tenancy Act, the Legislature probably intended that the rents or profits due by or to a co-sharer shall be recovered in the manner laid down in the U.P. Tenancy Act and in no case in the manner laid down by the Insolvency Law, though the debtor liable for such rents or profits may have been declared an insolvent. It is also noteworthy that by reason of section 167 of the U.P. Tenancy Act, such rents or profits are not debts provable under the Provincial Insolvency Act and no Court other than a Court of Revenue can take cognizance of the same. No question of the plaintiff's proprietary title here arises. Owing to the continued entry of the name of Gulab Singh in the Revenue papers, the right of Gulab Singh to recover the profits subsists, and there is nothing to prevent its sale to the plaintiff.

On either ground, therefore, I am of opinion that the existence of the Receiver, whose name is not entered in the Revenne papers, cannot be treated as a bar to the entertainment of the suit.

On the other question, namely whether an unsatisfied decree for arrears of rent due to the lambardar by a co-sharer can be set off against the arrears of profits, assigned by the latter to a third person, I agree that such a set off is not permissible under section 173, clause (g) of the U.P. Tenancy Act, except where the decree sought to be set off is due to and the debt sought to be recovered is due by the same person.

In view of the circumstances I concur in the order proposed to be passed about the costs of this reference.

By the Court:—The opinion of the Court with regard to the first question raised in this letter of reference from the Local Government is that it was open to the defendant lambardar to raise the question of want of title in the plaintiffs on the basis of the Insolvency Act (Act V of 1920). With regard to the second question the opinion of the Court is that the defendant lambardar was not entitled to claim a set off in respect of his decree for arrears of rent obtained against the defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4. We are further of opinion that the parties should bear their own costs in this Court.

Judgment:—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-appellant for the recovery of possession of certain property and for an account of the profits thereof on the allegation that the said property belonged to Balmukund, that he was succeeded by his two daughters, Mt. Godavari and Mt. Gopi and that on the death of Mt. Gopi, the entire property devolved on Mt. Godavari, the mother of the plaintiff. On the death of Balmukand mutation of names was effected in respect of the property left by him, in favour of Mt. Godavari and Mt. Gopi. Mt. Gopi died in Sambat 1935, leaving a son, Moti Lal, who died three years later. The defendant Jarau Lal is the son of Moti Lal; and the other defendants, Panna Lal and Hira Lal, are his grandsons.

On the 31st December, 1899, a partition is said to have been effected between Mt. Godavari and her sons, Jawahir Lal and Ganeshi Lal on the one hand, and Jarau Lal the grandson of Mt. Gopi on the other, and a deed of partition was executed and registered at Aligarh in evidence of the same.

Ganeshi Lal died childless in Sambat 1961. The allegation of the plaintiff was that after the death of Mt. Gopi Mt. Godavari became entitled according to the Mitakshara law to the entire estate left by her father; that her grandson Jarau Lal was brought up by Mt. Godavari, who treated him with great affection, and that the above deed of partition was obtained by Jarau Lal from Mt. Godavari by misrepresentation of facts and concealment from her of her real rights. It was also stated that the deed in question was not explained to her; that she had no independent advice, and that the plaintiff and his brother Ganeshi Lal were kept ignorant of their rights and of the arrangement then being made. It was further alleged that at the instigation of Jarau Lal, the plaintiff and his brother Ganeshi Lal were compelled by Mt. Godavari to sign the deed, and that the deed was without consideration and invalid and unenforceable.

The defence was that the parties were governed by the Mayukha Law, which prevailed in Gujarat, their original home; that Mt. Gopi got an absolute estate in the property inherited by her from her father and that the defendants were entitled to that property in succession to Mt. Gopi and her son Moti Lal. It was also urged that the deed of partition of the 31st December, 1899, was executed by Mt. Godavari and the plaintiff and his brother by their free consent, without any misrepresentation or undue influence; that the said partition had been acted upon since 1899 and that the plaintiff was estopped from questioning its validity. It was further pleaded that the claim was barred by limitation. It is not necessary to go into the other pleas raised in the suit.

The court below found that although no authentic history of the migration of this family from Gujarat was traceable, it was more than probable that it left Gujerat after the advent of Nil-Kanth in the 16th century; that the family came and settled in Aligarh about 150 years ago and continued to observe its original custom and practices, and that it was governed by Mayukha law, according to which a daughter was entitled to take an absolute estate in the property inherited by her from her father. It further found that Mt. Godavari and the plaintiff and his brother executed a deed of partition after fully understanding its terms, and in doing so acted after mature deliberation and in accordance with the advice of old men of their caste and their relations and friends, and that the deed operated as a family settlement and was valid and binding on the parties. It also held that the plaintiff was estopped by his conduct and acts, and that the claim was barred by limitation.

The main question for consideration is whether the family is governed by the Mitakshara law or by the law which prevailed in Gujerat before the family migrated to these Provinces, or in other words whether, according to the law applicable to the family, a daughter is entitled to an absolute estate.

The parties are Nagar Brahmans, whose original home was in Vadnagar, a large town in the Baroda State. From Vadnagar a section of the Nagar Brahmans proceeded to Idar and settled there and that section thereafter came to be called Idaria Nagars. From Idar they subsequently migrated to different places but at what period of time it is not possible to say. There is some evidence to show that the family to which the parties belong lived at one time in Banswara, Bundi and Kotah in Rajputana, and that Dina Nath, the earliest known ancestor of the family, moved from Muthra to Amroha and from Amroha to Aligarh, where a grove was planted by him, which is still in existence. The grove is said to be about 150 years old and goes by the name of Dinanath's grove. The family can therefore be said to have settled in these Provinces sometime about or before that period, that is, about 150 and 200 years ago.

It is practically admitted by the witnesses of both the parties that after the family migrated from Gujerat and settled in these Provinces, it continued to observe its original customs and practices in the matters of births, marriages and deaths. At home the Gujerati language is used; and marriages are celebrated outside the gotra even within 4 or 5 degrees. The ceremonies and ritual observed on occasions of births, marriages and deaths are those which used to be observed in their original home in Gujerat. There is nothing to show that they departed in any way from their old practices or custom or adopted the law which prevails in these Provinces after they settled here. It is well settled that the law of succession is in any given case to be determined according to the personal law of the individual whose succession is in question. Prima facie any person governed by the Hindu law is held to be subject to the particular doctrines of the Hindu law recognized in the province in which he is residing. That law becomes the personal law and part of the status of every family residing in it. Consequently where any such family migrates to another province governed by another law, it carried its own law with it (Mayne's Hindu Law, paragraph 48).

In Parbati Kumari v. Debi Jagdish Chander (1) and Balwant Rao v. Baji Rao (2) their Lordships of the Privy Council held that where a family migrated from one territory to another and preserved its ancient ceremonies and practices, the presumption was that it also preserved its personal law of succession, unless there was a proof of the renunciation of the original law for that of the place migrated to. The reason for the rule is that the Hindus being notoriously conservative in the matter of religious observances and rights, it is extremely improbable that the family which migrates would change its personal law, with which its religion is intimately connected.

It is important, therefore, to enquire what the law governing the Nagar Brahmans was in their original home in Gujerat and whether the same has been followed after they migrated to and settled in these Provinces.

The Vyavahar Mayukha is considered to be a work of paramount authority in Gujerat. It was written by Nil-Kanth, a Mahratta Brahmin, residing in Benares sometime in the 17th century and forms a part of a larger treatise called Bhagwant Bhaskara which was written under the direction of King Bhagwant Varman of the Sangar dynasty who flourished in Bundelkhand and whose capital was situated in Bhareha at the confluence of the Chambal and the Jamna. The Bhagwant Bhaskara is divided into 12 books, one of which deals with Vyavahar or recognized law and usage. A branch of the family of Nil-Kanth was settled in Poona. The work soon obtained considerable celebrity in the Mahratta country and some of the adjoining territories, and was early recognized as a standard work of authority on the subjects, with which it dealt (Sarvadhicari's Hindu Law of Inheritance, second edition, p. 311). The quotations frequently made by the Shastris attached to the Courts in Bombay and Gujerat in their Vyavasthas or opinions show that it was considered by them as an authentic source of the written law on the matter (West and Buhler's Hindu Law, fourth edition, p. 12). Indeed, as observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bai Kesar Bai v. Hansraj (3), where the Mitakshara and the Mayukha do not harmonise, the latter takes precedence of the former.

The Mayukha does not specifically discuss whether a daughter takes a mere life estate or an absolute estate in the property inherited by her from her husband. All that it says is :—

"In default of her (the wife), the daughter succeeds ; for says Manu (Chap. 9, 130) ' The son of man is even as himself and the daughter equal to the son. How then can one inherit (his wealth) but she, who stands as it were himself ? If there are more daughters than one, they should divide the wealth and take shares" (Mandlik's Vyavahar Mayukha, p. 79).

Nilkanth allows a similar division in the case of co-widows, so that the right to divide carries by itself no particular significance. The citation from Manu that "the son of a man is even as himself and the daughter is equal to the son" has been taken to mean that like a son, a daughter takes an absolute estate. But the citation is not followed by any comments by the author himself as to the nature of the estate inherited by a daughter, and while it is remarkable that what Manu said was, judging by the contest, said with reference to a putrika or appointed daughter (Buhler's Laws of Manu, p. 352) ; both the authors of the Dayabhaga and the Vyavahar Mayukha utilize it for the purpose of strengthening their contention that a daughter was entitled to inherit in the absence of sons in preference to the more distant relations. Probably the practice of killing daughters at the time of their birth or of excluding them from inheritance was at that time coming into fashion and attracting attention.

Anyhow, whatever the intention of the author of the Vyavahar Mayukha in citing that passage from Manu was, from as far back as 1859, if not earlier, the view attributed to the Vyavahar Mayukha, namely, that a daughter is entitled to an absolute estate has been accepted and enforced in Gujerat.

In one of the earliest cases the old Supreme Court of Bombay, after describing Manu, the Mitakshara and the Vyavahar Mayukha as the books of chief authority in that part of India, observed :

"Now according to all the authorities the daughters take next after the widow ; what then is the nature of the estate they take ? Here again there are differences of opinion ; but dealing with the question according to the three books I have mentioned it appears to me that the daughters take an absolute estate. We find quoted in the Mayukha a passage from Manu. ' The son of a man is even as himself and the daughter is equal to the son, how then can any other inherit property, but a daughter, who is, as it were himself ? ' With reference to this point also I consulted the Shastris both here and at Puna and enquired whether daughters could alienate any, and what portion of the property inherited from a father, who died separate. The answer was that, daughters, who so obtained, could alienate it at their will and pleasure ; and in this the Shastris of both places agree, both also referring to the above text in the Mayukha as their authority for that position" Pranjiwan Das v. Deo Kuar Bai (4).

In Hari Bhat v. Damodar Bhat (5) and other cases the same view was adopted, and it has recently been affirmed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Balwant Rao v. Baji Rao (2).

An attempt has been made on behalf of the plaintiff to establish that the family migrated from Gujerat long before the Vyavahar Mayukha was written, that is about 800 years ago but the oral evidence produced on the point and that is the only evidence here produced is not worth serious consideration. Even if adequate materials had existed, it may be well to remember what Lord Dunedin pointed out, that the commentaries are only commentaries, they do not enact, they explain and are evidence of the congeries or customs which from the law (Balwant Rao v. Baji Rao (2).)

In a case relating to a family of Ahban Thakurs, who had originally come from Gujerat and settled in Oudh many centuries ago their Lordships of the Privy Council similarly said :—

"Although the migration may have taken place before the Mayukha was written, it may well be that the rule was in force in earlier times and that on this point the Mayukha only embodied and defined a pre-existing custom (Chandika v. Manni (6).)

In any event it is important for the purposes of this case to enquire what the practice among the Nagar Brahmins in Gujerat was and has been during the last century in regard to the right of survivorship between the daughters of the last male holder in the case of the death of any of them with or without issue. A large number of instances have been cited on behalf of the defendants, extending from the time of Dina Nath, the common ancestor of the parties.

Dina Nath had two daughters Mt. Tej Kuar and Mt. Sahaj Kuar. He left a grove which was divided on the death of Mt. Tej Kuar between her son Lajja Shankar and Mt. Sahaj Kuar. Mt. Sahaj Kuar transferred her share of the grove to Kesho Ram, from whom it passed by successive transfers to Ganga Bishun, who is now in possession. The statement of the plaintiff was that the grove had been divided between Mt. Tej Kuar and Mt. Sahaj Kuar in their lifetime. But in the sale-deed executed by Kesho Ram in favour of Mt. Gaura on the 14th November, 1886, a half share of the grove in question was described as having fallen on the death of Dina Nath to the share of Mt. Sahaj Kuar and the other half to the share of Lajja Shankar and the private partition effected between them was also referred to (Ex. KKK).

The land of the grove was held by Dina Nath under a Muafi grant. In 1839 the land was resumed but was exempted from the payment of Government revenue so long as the trees existed; and a copy of the order granting the exemption, was given to the agent of Mt. Sahaj Kuar and Lajja Shankar, who held the grove at the time (Ex. R-R).

Kameshwarji of Kotah had two daughters Mt. Dhan Kuar and Mt. Gulab Kuar. The estate of Gulab Kuar devolved on her son Ganpat Lal and that of Dhan Kuar on her son Nathu Lal. The plaintiff states that on the death of Gulab Kuar her share devolved on Mt. Dhan Kuar, but that statement is refuted by the evidence of Ganpat Lal, the son of the former. [The judgment then dealt with specific instances of following mayukha and proceeded.]

There are thus in all about 30 instances showing that among Vadnagar Nagar Brahmans the daughters inherit an absolute estate and that on the death of one of the daughters, her share does not go by survivorship but devolves on her own issue.

There is no proof of any cogent instance to the contrary. Most of the witnesses adduced by the plaintiff are persons belonging to other castes, who could not have possessed any accurate knowledge as to the customs and practices prevailing in the Nagar Brahman community. Most of those who belong to that community, merely make vague and general statements without citing any specific instances in proof of what they assert. The only witness, who has made an attempt to cite some instances, is Jani Itchashankar of Aligarh. He states that Nagar Brahmans of the United Provinces and Rajputana do not write the names of their fathers after their names and that unlike what they do in Gujerat the ladies of their families observe pardah; but he forgets that the difference of surroundings is often responsible for a change of habits of that kind. There are for instance many people, who, following the English method, describe themselves by their surnames and their full or real names are often unknown to the outside world. He states that the daughters of Kameshwarji of Kotah were Mt. Dhan Kuar and Mt. Phul Kuar and on the death of the former, the other got the whole of his estate; but he is refuted on that point by Naunidh Lal, a descendant of Kameshwarji, and many other witnesses.

Naunidh Lal explains that Kameshwarji was a jagirdar of Kotah, and he adopted Nathu Lal, the son of one of his daughters, in order that the Jagir might continue in the family, inasmuch as no ladies were allowed by the State to get the Jagir. The adoption, if made did not, however, affect the devolution of the other property, which as stated by Naunidh Lal devolved on the daughters of Kameshwarji and on their descendants in succession. He admits that Jhamman Lal Jha of Benares had three daughters, Mt. Jamna Kuar Mt. Jugli Kuar and Mt. Manni Kuar and that on the death of the first-named, her sons got her property. He suggests that Jhamman Lal Jha left no money or ornaments and lived in a house on rent; but he goes on to say that when Mt. Manni Kuar and her daughter died, he wanted that her mother, Mt. Jugli Kuar, should get all the property, but he took no steps to enforce his claim. He also mentions that Jagan Nath Jha of Baneres left three daughters, Mt. Chameli, Mt. Manki and Mt. Jamna Kuar, and that when the last-named died childless, her sisters got her property. He however admits that she had no other relative alive and that on the death of Mt. Chameli, her sons got her share.

There can be no stronger instance the other way than that of the daughters of Dina Nath, already referred to for on the death of one of the daughters of Dina Nath the ancestor of the parties, the grove left by Dina Nath was divided between her son Lajja Shankar and his surviving daughter. There are 19 instances of similar succession from Ahmedabad, six from the Banswara State, one from Aterbhind, and the rest from Rajputana and the United Provinces.

On behalf of the plaintiff some stress has been laid on the decision in Lakshmi Ram Jani v. Hari Ram Dube (7); but in that case the question related to the right of succession to a Stridhan; and though the family was found to have migrated from Gujerat to Jaipur and from Jaipur to Benares about 100 or 150 years ago, no instances of succession under the Mayukha Law had been deposed to by any of the witnesses examined in the case; and that was treated as a fact of some significance, for the family was a big one and instances might have been expected to be forthcoming if the Mayukha Law had applied. Here an instance from the very family, to which the parties belong, has been proved and established beyond the possibility of doubt by the oral and documentary evidence adduced; and corroborated as it is by a large volume of evidence, coming from Gujerat and Rajputana, the presumption that the family brought its personal law when it migrated from Gujerat to these provinces, stands affirmed; and the claim of the plaintiff to the property, which Mt. Gopi had inherited from her father, must therefore fail.

The subsequent conduct of Mt. Godavari and her sons Jawahir Lal and Ganashi Lal, in agreeing to a partition of the property, left by Balmukand and Jarau Lal, the son of Mt. Gopi, further supports the same conclusion. There is evidence to show that Mt. Godavari thoroughly understood what she was doing when she executed the deed of partition of the 31st December, 1899. The deed was written after the plaintiff had an opportunity of consulting a pleader who is dead and could not be produced. After the death of Onkar Lal, the husband of Mt. Gopi, the plaintiff, claimed the entire property belonging to Balmukand, relying on the Mitakshara Law in support of his claim. A dispute arose and the parties sought the intervention of some members of the caste at Aligarh. They settled that Mt. Godavari and the present defendant should divide the property half and half and got the latter to pay Rs. 7,000 to the plaintiff in order that all possibility of litigation might be obviated and the matter finally closed. In accordance with that settlement a deed of partition was drawn up with the full consent of the plaintiff and his brother Ganeshi Lal. The Sub-Registrar went over to the house of Mt. Godavari; and there he read and explained the deed to her, and there can be no doubt that neither the plaintiff nor Mt. Godavari were under any misapprehension as to the effect of the transaction into which they were entering. The learned Subordinate Judge rightly characterised the evidence produced by the plaintiff as unreliable. The demeanour of the plaintiff in the witness-box was found to be unsatisfactory; and as the learned Subordinate Judge points out, he went on saying anything on the spur of the moment to fit in with his case. There was clearly a bona fide dispute between the parties as to the nature of their rights. That dispute was amicably settled and a large amount was paid by the defendant Jarau Lal to the plaintiff and his mother to set the matter at rest.

Section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act has no application because, as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Kanhai Lal v. Brij Lal (8) there is no question here of any conveyance of or of an agreement to convey any future right or expectancy or of an agreement to relinquish any such right or expectancy. Mt. Gopi had an absolute interest in the share, which she had inherited from her father. The claim laid by Mt. Godavari and the plaintiff to that share was set at rest in the manner settled by the parties and entered in the deed of partition aforesaid. That partition has since been acted upon, mutation of names was effected in accordance therewith and the parties have enjoyed their respective shares in accordance with the allotment then made. The claim is now barred by limitation. The other pleas have not been pressed.

This appeal therefore fails and is dismissed with costs including fees in this Court on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

KANHAIYA LAL AND MUKHERJI, JJ.

Kanhiya Lal—Defendant-Appellant

v.

Ashraf Khan and others—Plaintiffs and Defendants-Respondents.

S. A. No 379 of 1920, decided on 22nd January, 1924, against the decree of District Judge, Allahabad, dated 28th January, 1920.

Civ. Pro. Code, S. 11—Different capacities render section inapplicable, though cause of action is the same.

Where the title set up in a previous suit was a title based upon the property in suit being treated as waqf property in which plaintiff was interested like others in offering prayers, held, a suit claiming personal title as the heir of a certain person is not barred, capacity being different in the two suits. The fact of the identity of the causes of action in the two suits is immaterial. [P. 356, C. 1.]

N. P. Asthana—for Appellant.

Panna Lal—for Respondents.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.:—The dispute in this appeal relates to a house which was mortgaged along with another house by Najabat Khan in favour of the defendant-appellant and his brother Madho Prasad in 1892. On the death of Madho Prasad his interest devolved on the defendant-appellant. The defendant-appellant brought a suit to enforce his mortgage and got a decree for sale against the present defendants Nos. 2 to 6 as the heirs of Najabat Khan and in execution thereof he got the two houses aforesaid put up to sale.

A suit was then brought by the present plaintiffs-respondents other than Mt. Umda Bibi for a declaration that the house now in dispute was used as an Imambara and was waqf property, that the other house was his exclusive property by inheritance from Fateh Khan and that neither of those houses was liable to sale in execution of the above decree. That suit was dismissed in regard to the house now in dispute on a finding that it was not proved to be waqf property, but decreed in regard to a share in the other house which was found to be the property of Fateh Khan, the common ancestor of the then plaintiffs and the mortgagor.

The present suit has been filed by the same plaintiffs and a lady named Mt. Umda Bibi for the protection of their interests in the house, which was previously described as waqf property, from the impending sale. The courts below decreed the claim.

The first question for consideration is whether the omission of the plaintiffs other than Mt. Umda Bibi to set up the title, now sought to be enforced in the previous suit, operates as a bar to the present claim. In the previous suit the then plaintiffs sought to protect the entire house in question on the ground that it was waqf property. They had asserted a right to offer prayers and to perform religious rites therein in their personal capacity as beneficiaries; but the object of the suit was not to protect their personal rights alone but to protect the entire house which they had described as waqf property. In the present suit they seek to enforce their personal interests in the said house as the heirs of Fateh Khan. They had not excluded the present house from their claim in the previous suit. In fact they were claiming one of the houses mortgaged in their personal rights and seeking to protect the other house now in dispute on the ground that it was a waqf property. Having asserted that the latter was a waqf property, they could not have consistently claimed the same property as their personal property except possibly in an alternative form. They were, however, not under an obligation to adopt the latter course. Section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that the decision in a previous suit would not be a bar to a decision in a subsequent suit unless the matter in issue was directly and substantially in issue in the previous suit between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim, litigating under the same title. The title set up in the previous suit was a title based on the property in dispute being treated as waqf property, in which the plaintiffs were interested as much as other persons entitled to offer prayers therein. In the present suit they are claiming a personal title in themselves as the heirs of Fateh Khan. Explanation 4 of that section provides that any matter which might and ought to have been made a ground of defence or attack in a former suit should be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit, but it is not obligatory on a party seeking to protect certain property as waqf property from an impending sale to assert in the same suit any personal right thereto, to which he may afterwards find himself entitled in case the property in question is not found to be waqf property. It is immaterial whether they could have joined in the previous suit an alternative claim for the protection of the personal share they are now seeking. There was no obligation to join the two claims and their omission to set up the present title in the previous suit does not therefore bar the decision of that matter in the present litigation. As observed in Ali Moidin Ravuthan v. Elayachanidathil Kombi (1) the identity of the cause of action in immaterial. The right in which the relief was claimed in the previous suit was not the same in which the relief is claimed in the present one. The former suit was brought for the protection of what was described as public property. The present suit has been brought for the protection of personal or private rights. So far as the house in dispute went, the capacity in which the plaintiffs sued was not the capacity in which they are now suing; and section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure has therefore no application.

The second point for consideration is whether the claim was barred by adverse possession. It is stated that in 1865 a suit for partition was brought by one Rahmat Ali Khan the predecessor in title of two of the plaintiffs against Najaf Khan and Najabat Khan for partition of his share in the house in question and a decree was obtained in respect of which no steps were taken to obtain execution. The finding of the Courts below, however, is that in spite of that omission the plaintiffs have been in possession of the disputed property and that the mortgagor or his heirs have not been in adverse possession of the same. In the face of that finding the above contention is without any force.

The other pleas taken in the memorandum of appeal have not been pressed.

The appeal must therefore fail and is dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Mukerji, J.:—Assuming that the present claim might have been made as a claim in the alternative in the former suit, it is perfectly clear to my mind that it ought not to have been so added. The result of combining the two claims would have been this. In the same breath, the plaintiffs would have been under the obligation to adduce evidence that the property had been dedicated and belonged to the Almighty and in the same breath it would have been obligatory on them to adduce evidence to show that it was nobody else's property but theirs. In claiming the property as their own they would have been obliged to trace how the property descended and what share was theirs. Thus, contradictory issues would have arisen and the trial would have been immensely complicated. It was never therefore desirable that the two claims should be combined. This is enough to discredit the plea of res judicata. I agree in the rest of the judgment of my learned brother and in the order proposed.

Appeal dismissed.

Sarab Sukh Das and others—Defendants-Appellants

v.

Ram Prosad—Plaintiff-Respondent.

F. A. No. 15 of 1920, decided on 15th November, 1923, from a decree of Additional Sub-Judge, Moradabad, dated 21st November, 1919.

Hindu Law—Religious endowment—Dedication—A valid dedication can occur without the idol's being installed in a temple or even in the absence of a temple.

A certain village was purchased in the name of a deity and the income of the village was applied for worship and other charitable purposes by the Hindu family. But the idols were kept for some years in an ordinary house and not installed in a temple. In fact no temple was ever built but at the date of the suit it was found that the family intended to build one for the purposes of installing the Gods therein; held, that the village was validly dedicated as the building of a temple is not an absolutely necessary requisite.

Judgment:—The suit which has given rise to this appeal was instituted by the plaintiff-respondent for the partition of a one-third share of certain property, comprising landed property, houses and moveables. The parties are descended from one Sewa Ram, who died about 40 or 45 years ago, leaving two sons, Bhagwan Das and Gobardhan Das. The plaintiff is the grandson of Bhagwan Das. His father, Dharam Das, died in 1904, while Bhagwan Das was alive. One of the defendants was Gobardhan Das, who died during the pendency of the suit. The other defendants were the descendants of Bhagwan Das.

The allegation of the plaintiff was that the property in dispute was joint family property and that the defendants were refusing to make a partition. The defendants pleaded that the village Ram Dandi and gher No. 5 mentioned in the schedule attached to the plaint, were waqf property, endowed for the purpose of a temple to be constructed in the latter and that, excepting house No. 10, the rest of the property was their separate property. They further pleaded that Bhagwan Das had separated from Gobardhan Das about 40 years ago and that Dharam Das, the father of the plaintiff, had similarly separated from his father, Bhagwan Das, about 20 years later.

The court below found that the family lived jointly till about 4 or 5 years before the institution of the suit; that there had been no partition and that the entire property in dispute excepting the moveables, the existence of which was not proved, was property divisible between the parties.

The first question for consideration in this appeal is, whether the property in dispute was joint family property, and whether there had been any partition in the family at or about the time alleged by the defendants.

The evidence produced by the defendants on the latter point is, as the learned Subordinate Judge points out, very unsatisfactory. On the other hand several respectable witnesses have been examined on behalf of the plaintiff to prove that the family was joint. One of them, Mohar Lal, is an Honorary Magistrate who pays Rs. 2,000 as revenue and Rs. 1,800 as income-tax. He states that Bhagwan Das and his sons formed a joint family and had a joint business, and he supports his statement by producing the entries in his account books which go to show that there were money dealings between him and the firm styled Bhagwan Das Gobardhan Das, which belonged to the parties. He also states that at times Ram Prasad, the plaintiff, and Makhan Lal and others used to come to get money from the firm and to repay the same. He further states that to his knowledge there was never a partition in the family and that when the sister of the plaintiff was married, the entire arrangement in connection with the marriage was made and the expenditure connected therewith met by Gobardhan Das and the other members of the family.

Another witness, Tika Ram, who pays Rs. 26 as income tax states that Bhagwan Das and Gobardhan Das were joint; that the plaintiff Ram Prasad used to get expenses from the family shop, which was managed by Gobardhan Das, and that some of the defendants and their sons used to work in that shop.

Another witness Ramji Mal, a physician, similarly deposes that Bhagwan Das and Gobardhan Das formed a joint Hindu family and that whenever he went on a professional visit, Gobardhan Das and Sarab Sukh Das paid his fee for his attendance.

The statements of these witnesses are corroborated by certain documentary evidence produced in the case. There is, for instance, a copy of a plaint in a suit filed by Gobardhan Das in 1907 for the recovery of money due by certain debtors of the firm. After the institution of that suit an application was made by Bhagwan Das and his two sons, who were then alive, and by the present plaintiff under the guardianship of Bhagwan Das, stating that they were living jointly with Gobardhan Das and that they should be added as co-plaintiffs. This application was allowed, and Bhagwan Das and his sons Daulat Ram and Sarab Sukh Das and his grandson, the present plaintiff, were brought on the record. This could not evidently have been done without the consent of the then plaintiff Gobardhan Das. Again, in 1916 the sister of the plaintiff was married and an application was made by Gobardhan Das for permission to take a procession through the streets and for the use of fire-works in connection therewith. In that application he described the sister of the plaintiff as "his daughter." It is not possible to attach much significance to the use of the words "his daughter" in that petition, but from the fact that the application was made by Gobardhan Das, there is reason to think that he was taking an active and leading part in the affair, or in other words, such a part as would ordinarily be taken by the head or manager of a family in connection with the celebration of a marriage in it. Further, an extract from the income-tax register for 1916-17 has been produced, showing that the present plaintiff and Sarab Sukh Das, Daulat Ram and Gobardhan Das were jointly assessed to income-tax with reference to the income derived from the sugarcane press and houses held by the family.

There is also the evidence of Mohan Lal showing that the firm of Bhagwan Das, Gobardhan Das used to take moneys from time to time from him.

There is further on the record a decree which was jointly obtained by Gobardhan Das, Sarab Sukh Das and Daulat Ram against a certain debtor in 1915. The plaintiff was not a party to that decree; but from the fact that the other members of the family were co-plaintiffs with Gobardhan Das there can be no room for doubt that the entire family continued to work jointly till at least 1916.

On behalf of the defendants reliance has been placed on a written statement filed by Sarab Sukh Das and others in 1919 in which they stated that Bhagwan Das and Gobardhan Das were proprietors of the firm styled Bhagwan Das and that they had no concern with the firm. But the object of their disclaiming any connection with that firm obviously was to disavow any responsibility for any liability incurred by the firm and much weight cannot therefore be attached to that statement. In connection with the same suit Gobardhan Das was examined and in the statement which he then made he said that Bhagwan Das was his sharik and brother. That statement is inconclusive and does not necessarily support the defence. On a consideration of the entire evidence we are of opinion that the Court below has come to a right conclusion in holding that the plaintiff was living jointly with the other members of the family, including Gobardhan Das. In fact, the father of the plaintiff had died while the plaintiff was still a minor. He was brought up by his grandfather. The family carried on a joint business in which he took some part in getting money from and making payments to other firms; and the statement of the defendants that a partition had taken place, that Dharam Das had separated 20 years ago from his father, and that Bhagwan Das had separated from Gobardhan Das, cannot be trusted.

As regards the property in dispute, some of the purchases were made in the name of one member of the family and others in the name of another member of the family, but, as the family was joint at the time the purchases were made, the presumption is that they were made with joint family funds. No reliable evidence has been adduced on behalf of the defendants to establish that the purchases made in the names of the different members of the family were made out of their separate earnings; and in the absence of any evidence, the entire property so purchased must be treated as joint family property.

The case of the village Ram Dandi, however, stands on a different footing. It was purchased on the 30th of June, 1906, in the name of Sri Lachmi Narainji, an idol, said to have been installed in a temple situated in one of the houses at Chandausi. The purchase was made for a sum of Rs. 5,000 and the greater portion of the consideration was applied to the payment of a debt due to Sarab Sukh Das and of certain other debts due to certain other persons by the vendor. There is no evidence to show when the debts were paid; but as the sale-deed stands in favour of, and in the name of Sri Thakurji, known as Sri Lachmi Narainji Maharaj, the presumption that any purchase made in the name of any member of the joint family would be deemed to have been made with joint family funds, would not be applicable. A purchase made in the name of a stranger is prima facie a purchase made by him for his own use. There is evidence to show that in 1895 three idols had been obtained through an official attached to the Rangaji temple of Brindaban and that the expenses of the purchase of those idols were met by the firm of Bhagwan Das, Gobardhan Das. The idols were made of copper and weighed two maunds, sixteen seers. They were, according to the evidence of Mohan Lal, placed in a certain shop, from which they were removed about 18 or 19 years ago to house No. 3, where they still exist. The intention of the family evidently was to build a separate temple for the installation of those idols; but no temple appears to have been built for the purpose. During the pendency of the suit Gobardhan Das executed a tamliknama, by which he disposed of the greater portion of his property in favour of Sarab Sukh Das, and a deed of waqf, by which he dedicated one-fourth of the house, entered as No. 5 in the plaint, and a one-fourth share of the income of the village Kulaha; the former for the construction of the temple there and the latter for the expenses of its upkeep. In the deed of waqf he stated that an oral dedication had already been made of the gher previously by him and his brother Bhagwan Das. But no evidence has been produced in support of that statement. The effect of the present suit was to create a separation in the family and thereby to give power to Gobardhan Das to dispose of his share in the family property in any way he thought proper. The waqf cannot therefore operate except as regards his share of gher No. 5 and of the village Kulaha. As regards the village Ram Dandi, the defendants have produced certain account books beginning from the 26th of September, 1906, and ending with the 8th of August, 1918, wherein the income of the village and the xpenses incurred in connection with the emple are detailed. The account books purport to be in the handwriting of Sarab Sukh, who was not produced; but the evidence of Mohan Lal proves that they were maintained in the ordinary course of business by Sarab Sukh who was in charge of the endowed property. The account books show that the entire income derived from the village Ram Dandi was applied to the maintenance of the worship of the idols installed in the house and to charitable relief. They further go to show that the village Ram Dandi had all along been treated as waqf property and that neither Bhagwan Das nor any of his descendants ever objected to the use of the income for the purposes aforesaid. If the village Ram Dandi had been joint family property, it is obvious that the income derived from that village would have been brought into the family hotchpot and used for family purposes. That was not, however, the case. That village must, therefore, be treated as waqf property purchased for the benefit of Sri Lachmi Narainji Maharaj, that is, the deity who was to be subsequently installed in a temple to be constructed for his use.

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that there could be no valid and effective waqf, because no temple was actually built and no idols were set up. But as has already been pointed out, the family had obtained idols to set up bearing the name borne in the sale-deed, and the income which was derived from the village purchased in his name was used for the purposes of worship and other charitable purposes. In fact, the actual installation of idols or the construction of a temple is not absolutely necessary for validating a deed of waqf made for such a purpose. In Chatarbhuj v. Chaterjit (1), where by a deed of gift certain zamindari property was expressed to be given to an idol, which was not at the time of execution in existence, and possession of the property was made over to a certain person as pujari, it was held that the deed was valid and created a trust in favour of the idol. In Bhupati Nath Smrititirtha v. Ram Maitra (2), it was similarly held that the principle of Hindu Law which invalidates a gift other than to a sentient being capable of accepting it, does not apply to a bequest to trustees for the establishment of an image and the worship of a Hindu deity after the testator's death, nor does it make such a bequest void. The name given to a deity is only a sacred convention. The deity is supposed or believed to exist from eternity. The idol is virtually treated as a visible symbol of the deity in whose favour the dedication is made or by whom the purchase is to be effected; and the mere fact that the installation takes place afterwards, does not affect the validity of the dedication or of the purpose for which the purchase is made.

(2) (1909) 37 Cal. 128 (F.B.).

It only remains to consider how far the properties entered in the deed of waqf executed by Gobardhan Das on the 18th of September, 1918, were partible. Both the gher and the village Kulaha must be treated as joint family property because they were purchased in the name of some member of the family or another when the family was joint. The family purchased an old ancestral house and carried on a certain sugarcane pressing business. It possessed the nucleus round which the acquisitions could grow; and in the absence of any evidence to show that these purchases were made by any member or members of the family out of separate funds, they must necessarily be treated as joint family property. But the effect of the institution of the present suit for partition was to create a separation between Ram Prasad and the other members of the family, and Gobardhan Das had therefore a right under the Hindu Law to dispose of his share of the property. The waqf is therefore valid so far as his half share of the said property is concerned.

In the plaint originally filed, the plaintiff had claimed a one-sixth share, but on the death of Gobardhan Das, he amended the plaint and claimed to own a one-third share in the entire property. The Court below has rightly awarded a one-sixth share to him. The claim of the plaintiff ought therefore to be allowed in respect of the said one-sixth share except in regard to the village Ram Dandi and a half share of the village Kulaha and gher, No. 5 comprised in the waqf of the 18th of September, 1918.

The appeal is allowed in so far that the decree for partition granted by the Court below will be confined to the property other than the village Ram Dandi and a half share of gher No. 5 and of the village Kulaha mentioned in the deed aforesaid. It will be open to the defendants when a partition is effected to remove the idols lying in house No. 3 to such place as may be constructed for their reception either in that portion of gher No. 5 which may be allotted to them or in such other place as they think proper. Subject to these reservations the decree of the Court below will be confirmed. The plaintiff shall get 5/6th of his costs and the defendants 1/6th of their costs throughout.

Decree modified.

Khairati Lal—Respondent.

F. A. No. 173 of 1921, decided on 5th December, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Aligarh, dated the 6th January, 1921.

Specific performance—If valuer through fraud or mistake undervalues property agreed to be sold at his valuation no decree can be passed.

Where the contract refers the price to a valuer for him to ascertain between the parties, this fact does not of itself preclude the Court from inquiring into the adequacy of the consideration and this inadequacy of consideration would, of course, be strengthened as a defence if any circumstances arose which threw a doubt on the accuracy with which the valuation was made. If the undervalue were such as to convince the Court that the valuers had acted under fraud or mistake the contract would be incapable of enforcement in equity; but it is otherwise if the undervalue did not so convince the Court. [P. 361, C. 2 and P. 362, C. 1.]

S. N. Sen—for Appellant.

K. N. Katju and B. E. O'Conor—for Respondents.

Mears, C. J.:—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh. The action was one brought by Hira Lal for specific performance of an agreement, Khairati Lal being the defendant. The plaintiff and defendant each had a certain share in a house in mohalla Dhusaran in Aligarh. They had frequent quarrels and those quarrels brought them to the criminal courts, and it appears that when the Deputy Collector was investigating or about to investigate one of those criminal complaints it was suggested that as these parties could not live pleasantly in close proximity to each other it would be a very good thing if one sold his share of the house to the other and removed himself to a distance. That view seemed in the circumstances to both of them to be a wise thing to do, and on the 4th of September, 1919, when the parties were before a Magistrate of the second class they agreed that one Sohan Lal, a pleader, should act in preparing an estimate of the price of the share in the house owned and possessed by Hira Lal. Eight days later, on the 12th of September there was a formal agreement which gave Sohan Lal the power to determine what was the value of the house and for what amount the share should be sold, and it was agreed that Khairati Lal would purchase the share that Hira Lal possessed in the house for the amount that Babu Sohan Lal might determine to be. There was nothing whatever said about the method of procedure that Sohan Lal should adopt except that he was to determine the value of the house after inspecting it. That was all he had to do. He did inspect the house, of that there is no doubt, and on the 29th of September he valued the share of Hira Lal in the house at Rs. 5,500. That amount came as a considerable shock to Khairati Lal, and on the 8th of October he in fact offered to sell his share at a price which would show a considerably less value than Rs. 5,500 as Hira Lal's share in the house. Again, in the written statement in paragraph 19 he offered to sell his share in the house for Rs. 1,500 and put his share twice as much as Hira Lal's. On that basis therefore he was expressing his willingness to part with his share in the house at a price very very far below the estimated value put upon Hira Lal's share by Sohan Lal. When the case came to trial somehow or other Sohan Lal was got into the box and he gave evidence. When he gave evidence it became perfectly clear that he had acted in a thoroughly careless manner. He appeared to have no idea whatever of the proper way of discharging the duty which he had undertaken and we are greatly astonished that a pleader of mature age and presumably some legal experience should have conducted himself in the way that he did. On his own admission he did not ask the advice of anybody as to the rates and prices which were prevailing in the mohalla. We do not say that it was necessary for him to do that, because he might in his own experience already have got a fair general idea. It would however have been a prudent thing for him to do this and it might have saved him from giving an estimate which we regard as completely extravagant. We now know the basis of that estimate, and he says that having had the rooms counted he prepared an estimate of the price by guess. What in fact he did is clear from an answer he made to the Court. He took what he believed to be the price of materials and the price of labour prevailing in the year 1919, and he worked out a figure of what he believed would have cost if somebody started to build on that site a portion of the house such as he was called upon to value. He was aware that he was dealing with a house at least 40 years old as regards, at all events, the principal structure, and it never occurred to him at all that he was proceeding upon a completely unfair basis. What he ought to have done would have been to have asked himself what was the value of the house after allowing for the fact that it was a house 40 years of age. The proper question for him to put to himself was what would a willing purchaser be likely to give to a seller according to the original structure of the house, its present condition and location. When questions directed to show that his value was over-estimated were put to him he dropped down to a sum of Rs. 3,000 as being the value of the house as it stands to-day. There is no doubt that Mr. Ali Ausat took a strong view with regard to Mr. Sohan Lal's incompetence and carelessness. We take the same view and we consider that he is deserving of censure and reprobation.

Now comes the appellant who says that he is entitled to a decree for specific performance, that is to say, that this Court in the exercise of its discretion must decree that Khairati Lal shall pay Rs. 5,500, for a property manifestly worth not more than Rs. 3,000. We decline to do it, and it so happens that this type of case has been considered in some of the English decisions. In the sixth edition of Fry on Specific Performance, page 215, the law is summarised in this way " where the contract refers the price to a valuer for him to ascertain between the parties, this fact does not of itself preclude the Court from inquiring into the adequacy of the consideration, and this inadequacy of consideration would, of course, be strengthened as a defence if any circumstances arose which threw a doubt on the accuracy with which the valuation was made. The effect of an undervaluing by the valuers is a question which has however been but little discussed in our Courts : it has been debated with the usual diversity of opinion by the writers on civil law. It is conceived that, if the under-value were such as to convince the Court that the valuers had acted under fraud or mistake, the contract would be incapable of enforcement in Equity; otherwise, if the under-value did not so convince the Court". We are of opinion here that the valuer arrived at his finding by applying a wholly mistaken standard. We therefore, approve the decision of the Subordinate Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Where the husband executed a mortgage on behalf of his wife but the authority was not proved. Held that a decree can be passed against the estate that he got as heir to his wife.

Iqbal Ahmad—for Appellant.

B. E. O'Conor—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J. :—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for sale on a mortgage.

The mortgage was executed on the 11th of January, 1909, in favour of Sheikh Shahab-ud-din, the husband of the plaintiff, since deceased.

This mortgage was executed by one Muhamad Aizaz Ali Khan, the second defendant in the case. He purported to execute this deed as the general attorney of his wife Mt. Mahfuz-un-nissa who was impleaded as the first defendant.

The sum borrowed under the mortgage was Rs. 3,000. There was a personal covenant to pay and a further covenant that in the event of failure to pay, the mortgaged property might be brought to sale. The property, it may be remarked was the property of Mt. Mahfuz-un-nissa.

The two defendants Mahfuz-un-nissa and Muhammad Aizaz Ali Khan set up separate defences. The lady took the line of defence that she was no party to the mortgage-deed. She did not deny that her husband had executed the mortgage in question, although we find a statement to this effect in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge, a statement which on our reading of the pleadings appears to be erroneous.

The lady really sought to protect herself against the claim of the plaintiff by saying that her husband, defendant No. 2, had no authority to execute the mortgage-deed which was being sued upon. She stated that the power of attonery which was held by her husband had not been explained to her and was therefore not binding upon her.

The husband, defendant No. 2, did not deny the execution of the mortgage. He put forward a variety of pleas in order to show that the suit was not maintainable.

The learned Judge of the Court below dismissed the claim. He was of opinion in the first place that the plaintiff had failed to give due proof of the execution of the mortgage-deed in suit.

In the next place, he held that the plaintiff had failed to prove that the power of attorney under colour of which the mortgage-deed had been executed was a document binding on the lady. The Subordinate Judge states that there was no satisfactory proof for the purpose of showing that the document had been duly explained to the lady and that she was in a position to fully appreciate the legal consequences of her act when she executed the document.

The plaintiff in the Court below also claimed to be entitled to a personal decree on the strength of a certain acknowledgment contained in the letter which was written by the second defendant on the 6th of April 1914. The learned Subordinate Judge, however, was of opinion that this acknowledgment could not affect either of the defendants and consequently he refused to order any personal decree.

The plaintiff now comes up in appeal and a variety of grounds are put forward upon which the judgment of the court below is challenged. Before we proceed to discuss the question which arises for determination here it is important to notice that since the appeal has been filed the first defendant, Mt. Mahfus-un-nissa has died, her heirs have now been made parties to the record and one of these heirs is her own husband the second defendant, Muhammad Aizaz Ali Khan, who, under the Muhammadan law, has become entitled as one of his wife's heirs to a one-fourth share of the mortgaged property. That fact will have to be borne in mind later on when we come to announce our decision regarding the liability of Aizaz Ali Khan.

We begin with the finding of the court below that execution of the document was not duly proved. Here, we have to record our disagreement with the view taken by the learned Judge of the court below. It was never contended that Mt. Mahfuz-un-nissa herself had executed this deed of mortgage. The case for the plaintiff was that the deed was executed by her husband who was her duly constituted attorney. The husband never denied the execution of the deed and in the circumstances it seems to us that execution was duly proved and the plaintiff discharged all the onus which lay upon her in this respect. We refer in this connection to section 70 of the Indian Evidence Act. We pass on therefore to what is really the important question in the case, namely, whether the mortgage sued upon could be deemed to be binding upon the first defendant, Mahfuz-un-nissa.

It can only be so if we are satisfied that at the time the document was executed her husband had full authority to act on her behalf. This takes us back to the power of attorney from which that authority is said to be derived and that document is a document, dated the 12th November 1898.

It is a fact that the original power of attorney was not produced in the court below. Obviously it was in the possession either of Mahfuz-un-nissa or of her husband. Notices were issued to them to produce it but it was not produced.

In order therefore, to prove that such a document had been executed it became necessary to call the Sub-Registrar in whose office the power of attorney had been registered. It was not possible for the plaintiff to produce a certified copy of the power of attorney for, according to the evidence of the Sub-Registrar and according to the rules on the subject, no stranger is entitled to obtain from the registration department certified copy of a document of this nature.

The Sub-Registrar of Moradabad was called and brought with him the registration volume in which this power of attorney had been copied.

It may be noted that the Sub-Registrar who gave evidence was not the same Sub-Registrar who had registered the deed in the year 1898.

There can be no doubt from the entry in the register which was produced before the learned Subordinate Judge that, a power of attorney was executed on the 12th of November, 1898, by Mt. Mahfuz-un-nissa in favour of her husband.

The contents of this power of attorney were read out in Court by the Sub-Registrar who quoted from the entries in this register. It appears that amongst other things the power of attorney gave the husband authority to borrow money for household and court expenses, to pledge or hypothecate his wife's property in any way or to mortgage, sell the whole or any part of his wife's property, or to make a gift of his wife's property or a waqf, or to make an exchange of it.

It is thus obvious that the power of attorney which the lady executed in her husband's favour was couched in very wide language and gave him practically unlimited powers of disposal over his wife's estate.

This being so, it becomes necessary to consider whether the requirements of the law with respect to deeds of this kind executed by pardanashin ladies have been met in this case. It has been laid down as the law by a string of rulings that where a person relies on a document of this nature and is making a claim against a pardanashin woman, based upon a document of this kind, it is incumbent upon him to give satisfactory evidence that the document has been explained to and understood by the lady. We may refer to the following cases in this connection:—Sudisht Lal v. Mt. Sheobarat Koer (1), Shambati Koeri v. Jago Bibi (2), and Sajjad Husain v. Abid Hussain Khan (3).

The doctrine is well understood. The only difficulty which arises is as to its application to particular cases. No uniform standard of evidence which will satisfy the court can be laid down, and each case must be decided on its own facts.

Turning to the evidence in this case all we have is what was read out in court by the Sub-Registrar from the volume of the register which he produced before the Subordinate Judge.

This register contains copies of the endorsements which were made upon the power of attorney at the time of its registration. We refer to the following endorsements which contain the only evidence regarding the question as to whether the document was duly explained to the lady and understood by her.

We begin with the following:—

"To-day I went in person to the executant of this general power of attorney at 5 p.m. and satisfied myself that Mt. Mahfuz-un-nissa executed this power of attorney of her own free-will and accord. The abovenamed executant affixed her signature to the power of attorney in my presence and she was identified by Ehsan Ali Khan and Muhammad Sarfaraz Ali Khan".

This endorsement therefore can be relied upon for the purpose of showing that as a matter of fact the lady executed a document in the presence of the Registering Officer and that he was satisfied that this execution had been made of her own free-will and accord.

A further endorsement in the following language is also proved to have been recorded on the power of attorney:—

"Mt. Mahfuz-un-nissa . . . . . after hearing all the contents of the document admitted it in a loud voice from behind the door at her dwelling house."

We observe here that the translation of this passage in the paper book is not quite correct.

This is the whole of the evidence upon which we are asked to find that the document was read to the lady and explained to her so that she was thoroughly aware of the consequences which would follow in law from her act of execution.

It has been argued before us that the declaration made by the Sub-Registrar and embodied in the endorsement on the deed is sufficient proof that the document was read and explained to the lady.

It is to be noted however that while the language used by the Registering Officer would indicate that the document had been read out to the lady there is nothing expressly indicating that he explained the document to the lady; in other words, that he explained to the lady what the results of her actions would be. We have been referred to the registration rules which were issued in the year 1896 and which were therefore in force at the time this document was registered. Under rule 185, Registering Officers were directed in the case of documents executed by pardanashin ladies, to obtain the admission of execution from the executant's own lips. The rule further lays down the necessity for having the lady properly identified and a further direction is given that the terms of the document should be explained to the executant and if, while admitting execution she objects to any of the terms, a note of such objection should be made.

We are asked to presume that the Sub-Registrar must have carried out the rule to which we have just referred and that consequently we ought to hold that the document was duly explained to the lady so as to be thoroughly understood by her.

The case is no doubt a somewhat difficult one and it has been rendered more difficult by reason of both the lady and her husband keeping out of the witness-box. That is a circumstance which has to be weighed. But making allowance for everything, we have in the end to decide whether there is before us that satisfactory evidence of explanation and understanding which the law requires.

All we can say is, that after giving the case our most careful consideration we are not satisfied that the plaintiff has discharged the duty which the law cast upon her, and so, as regards this part of the case we cannot disagree with the finding of the Court below.

There remains only one other question and that is with respect to the liability of the husband.

(1) (1881) 7 Cal. 245 (P.C.)
(2) (1902) 29 Cal. 749 (P.C.)
(3) (1912) 34 All. 455.

We have already referred to the fact that the husband admitted the execution of this document although his statement was that the property which was being mortgaged was not his property.

That was a true statement of course, at the time it was made. But we have it now that a one-fourth share in the mortgaged property has come to the husband by inheritance and we have therefore to deal with the question of his liability as things now stand.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad has, in this connection, relied upon the provisions of section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act and we think that plea is well taken. It is at the option of the plaintiff under this section to seek a remedy against the property which has come into the possession of Aizaz Ali Khan, and therefore, if there is a debt owing from Aizaz Ali Khan in respect of the mortgage-deed in suit that debt may be enforced against this one-fourth share which has now become his property.

As regards the question of the indebtedness of Aizaz Ali Khan we think there can be no reasonable doubt. It is proved beyond all question that the money which was borrowed under the mortgage was delivered into his hands. Furthermore, in a letter which is on the record (Ex. 2, printed at page 29 of the record) Aizaz Ali Khan, on the 6th of April, 1914, admitted that he took this money to meet his own expenses, and he further, in paragraph 4 of that letter, made a statement clearly indicating that at that date, the debt was still subsisting. This being so, and the acknowledgment having been within six years of the date of the mortgage and also within six years of the date of the suit, we think Aizaz Ali Khan is clearly bound and that as against him a decree can be passed by which the debt incurred under the document in suit can be enforced against a one-fourth share of the mortgaged property now belonging to Aizaz Ali Khan since the time of his wife's death.

We therefore give a decree for the full amount of the mortgage against Aizaz Ali Khan and we also give a decree for sale directing the sale of the one-fourth share of the mortgaged property which he has inherited from his wife. The usual decree for sale will be prepared. The plaintiff will be entitled to recover costs from Aizaz Ali Khan both in this Court and in the Court below. The costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

As regards the respondents Nos. 1 to 6 the suit against them fails and is dismissed with costs in both Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed as regards respondents 1 to 6 and allowed as regards other respondents.

v.

Krishna Chandra Bhattacharji and others—Respondents.

F.A. No. 334 of 1921, decided on 18th December, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Meerut, dated 7th May, 1921.

(a) Executor—Probate does not create title but from death title vests in executor.

Every executor derives his title from the will and not from the probate. The probate is indeed the only proper evidence of the executor's appointment but notwithstanding this it is clear that the executor represents the estate of the testator from the time of his death. (14 C.W.N. 256, Diss.)

• • (b) Transfer of Property Act, S. 3 (c)—Machinery.

Unless machinery was attached to the building for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of the building itself it is not immoveable property, especially where the building is really put up for the purpose of sheltering the machinery and protecting it from the weather.

Nehal Chand and K. N. Katju—for Appellants.

P.L. Banerji and Saila Nath Mukherji—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.:—These two cases are connected together. The earlier one F. A No. 334 of 1921 ought strictly speaking to be decided first, but in view of the facts we are about to set out we consider it expedient to dispose of first F. A. No. 86 of 1923. The record in that case has not been printed. We were of opinion that it was unnecessary to have this done in view of the decision at which we are about to arrive.

Before we proceed to deal with the questions which arise for determination before us it is necessary to set out a number of facts which will have to be referred to hereafter.

We are concerned in these two cases with certain items of property which belonged to a Bengali gentleman named Kailash Chandar Bhattacharji.

This gentleman on the 16th August, 1910, in order to raise a loan of Rs. 25,000 mortgaged three items of property to a mortgagee named Lala Ram Das.

Those items of property were as follows:—

1. Mauza Sherpur.
2. Mauza Lalpur.
3. The Christy Cotton Baling Press.

The Bank of Upper India, Limited, Meerut, which afterwards went into liquidation had obtained in the year 1910 a simple money decree against Kailash Chandra Bhattacharji and in execution of this decree the Bank got Mauza Sherpur brought to sale and it was purchased on the 20th January, 1913, by one Benarsi Das.

That sale was held subject to the mortgage which had been executed by Kailash Chandar in the month of August, 1910.

In the month of June, 1913, Banarsi Das, the auction-purchaser of Sherpur, redeemed the mortgage of the 16th August, 1910, by paying a sum of Rs. 2,885 to the mortgagee Lala Ram Das.

Kailash Chandar died on the 16th September 1912. He left a will bearing date the 10th August, 1911, and made bequests in favour of his widow and his four children.

One of these children was B. Krishna Chandar Bhattacharji who was appointed executor under the will.

Krishna Chandar Bhattacharji took out probate of the will on the 13th December 1913.

These are practically all the facts we have got to deal with in deciding the present cases.

To return to F. A. No. 86 of 1923. This appeal arose out of a suit brought by two sons and a daughter of the deceased Kailash Chandar in order to avoid the sale which took place in execution of the simple money decree obtained by the Bank of Upper India against their father Kailash Chandar.

The ground upon which these plaintiffs sought to avoid that sale was that the execution proceedings had been taken behind their backs and at the time the order for sale was made they had not been parties to the record.

The substantial defence which was set up by the defendants in that case, who included the liquidators of the Bank of Upper India, was that the sale was perfectly valid and could not be set aside. It was pleaded that execution of the simple money decree against Kailash Chandar had begun in the latter's lifetime and it was pointed out that after his death his son Krishna Chandar was made a party to the execution proceedings in place of his deceased father.

It was claimed that Krishna Chandar being the executor of his father's estate completely represented that estate in the execution proceedings and that consequently there was no ground whatever upon which these plaintiffs were entitled to have the sale declared void.

The Subordinate Judge, who dealt with this suit, Mr. Abdul Halim, dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. He was of opinion that in no way could the execution sale at which Banarsi Das purchased the property be deemed to be void. He was of opinion that in the execution proceedings leading up to the sale the estate of the deceased Kailash Chandar was fully represented by the executor.

The same question was in issue in the other suit out of which F.A. No. 334 of 1921 has arisen. That suit with which we shall have to deal presently was a suit brought to enforce certain rights under the mortgage executed in the month of August 1910.

The sons and daughter of Kailash Chandar, who were the plaintiffs in the suit which we have just been discussing, were impleaded as defendants in this mortgage suit and they raised the plea that Banarsi Das, whose interest is now vested in all the plaintiffs in the mortgage suit, could take no title under the purchase which he made in execution of the Bank's decree.

The Subordinate Judge, who decided this particular case, Mr. P. K. Ray, repelled the contention that Krishna Chandar fully represented the estate in the execution proceedings. Mr. Ray was of opinion that although Krishna Chandar was without doubt the executor of his father's estate at the time these execution proceedings were going on, he had not taken out probate and for that reason Mr. Ray seems to have thought that he did not fully represent the estate.

On the other hand Mr. Ray was of opinion that notwithstanding this circumstance it could not be declared that the sale in execution of the decree was void. It was pointed out that at any rate one of the legal representatives of the deceased judgment-debtor party to those proceedings, namely, Krishna Chandar, and that the failure to cite as parties to the proceedings the other representatives of Kailash Chandar amounted at most only to an irregularity whereby the sale in execution could not be treated as being void, but at the best, voidable only.

In deciding this matter the learned Subordinate Judge relied upon the principles laid down in the Privy Council ruling in Malkarjun v. Narhari (1).

We are quite satisfied that both Courts were right in holding that this execution sale could not in any way be treated as a void sale. We prefer to follow the reasons given by Mr. Abdul Halim in his judgment and we have no hesitation in saying that in the execution proceeedings anterior to the sale of the property the estate of the deceased judgment-debtor was fully represented. It seems to us nothing to the point to say that Krishna Chandar, who undoubtedly was his father's executor, could not fully represent the estate at the time these execution proceedings were going on because he had not at that time obtained probate of the will. It is to be pointed out that every executor derives his title from the will and not from the probate. The probate is indeed the only proper evidence of the executor's appointment, but notwithstanding this it is clear that the executor represents the estate of the testator from the time of his death. There is clear provision to this effect in section 179 of the Indian Succession Act which declares that the executor is the legal representative of the deceased for all purposes, and all the property of the deceased person vests in him as such.

It is an admitted fact that probate of the will was subsequently taken out and that being so we, who are dealing with the case now, must take it that Krishna Chandar has conclusively been proved to be the executor of his father's estate, and that the estate of his father vested in him from the date of his father's death. The probate which was subsequently taken out establishes the will from the date of the testator's death and is conclusive proof of the appointment of the executor; and further it is provided by law, that once probate is taken out by the executor all intermediate acts which he has done in connection with the estate of the testator are validated.

It seems to us therefore to be impossible to say that the estate of the deceased judgment-debtor was not fully represented in these execution proceedings.

We may say here that we are not able to follow the view taken by a Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Doya Narain Tiwari v. The Secretary of State for India in Council reported in 14 C.W.N. 256.

At the same time we recognise that the judgment of the other Subordinate Judge, Mr. Ray, also proceeds upon a correct principle and that even had our opinion regarding the nature of the executor's position been other than it is, we should have agreed with Mr. Ray's decision that the case ought to be dealt with upon the principles laid down in the Privy Council ruling to which we have referred. We take it therefore as being clear on all hands that the suit brought by the sons and daughter of Kailas Chandar for the purpose of having this sale set aside was bound to fail, and we hold definitely that the sale was not void but was a perfectly valid sale in favour of Banarsi Das.

As held by the learned Subordinate Judge, Mr. Ray even if we were disposed to hold that the sale was voidable the suit brought by the sons and daughter was barred by limitation. The period of limitation to set aside a sale of this nature is one year and that period expired long ago.

This finding therefore disposes of F. A. No. 86 of 1923 which we must dismiss with costs to the respondent including in this Court fees on the higher scale, if any.

We have now to come to the other case, namely F. A. No. 334 of 1921.

We have already mentioned the fact that the plaintiffs in this case are said to represent the interest of Benarsi Das who purchased one of the items of the mortgaged property in the year 1913.

We have also mentioned the fact that on the 3rd June, 1913, Banarsi Das redeemed the mortgage which had been executed by Kailash Chandar on the 16th August, 1910.

The object of the present suit is to obtain the balance of this mortgage money against the persons who have become subsequent transferees of the properties mortgaged other than the item of Sherpur which has come into the hands of the plaintiffs.

(1) (1901) 25 Bom. 337 (P.C.).

The village of Lalpur which was one of the items of property mortgaged was sold to one Kishori Lal who is now represented by the defendants Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9 in this suit.

The other item of the mortgaged property, namely, the Christy Cotton Baling Press was sold to the defendant No. 5.

The plaintiffs are claiming as representatives of the original mortgagee to recover out of the items mortgaged the sums which they are liable to contribute under the mortgage.

One of the pleas which was raised on behalf of the 5th defendant, the present owner of that item of property known as the Christy Cotton Baling Press, was that the suit was time-barred. The validity of that plea depended upon the question whether this Baling Press was to be treated as moveable or immoveable property.

In the mortgage-deed which was executed by the deceased Kailash Chandar he described this particular item of property in the following words :—

"Ek manzil karkhana wa imarat mausuma Christy Cotton Baling Press, Meerut mai jami saman mutaliqa uske."

So far as we understand the case the 5th defendant who has been impleaded, purchased the Baling Press, i.e., the machinery which goes to make up the Press and has removed it to some place in the Punjab.

The learned Judge of the Court below was opinion that the machinery of this Baling Press had undoubtedly been mortgaged under the document in suit. But he was of opinion that the machinery was moveable property and that consequently the second schedule of article 120 of the Limitation Act would apply.

It is now argued before us that the decision of the Court below on this point was wrong and that the item of property described in the mortgage-deed in the language to which we have just referred ought to be treated as immoveable property and not moveable property. After full consideration of the arguments we are unable to entertain this contention.

We would say in the first place that there is practically no evidence on the record which gives us any accurate idea as to how this Baling Press was set up at Meerut.

There is no doubt a reference in the mortgage-deed to a building or "imarat" but if we look to the evidence in the case all we can find is this. One of the plaintiffs' witnesses, Wasiyat Ali, says "I saw the Christy Cotton Press for the first time at the end of 1913. The machinery was kept in the enclosure of Ganga General Mills."

The only other witness who speaks about this property is one Mr. Damodar Das, Vakil. This gentleman is the Director of the Ganga General Mills. He has deposed that the Mills held on lease the land on which their buildings were erected and it was stated by Mr. Damodar Das that his company gave B. Kailash Chandar Bhattacharji a plot of land to keep his Cotton Baling Press on. Witness did not know the terms on which the ground had been given to Bhattacharji. He says he was treated as a sub-tenent. In cross-examination the witness said that K. C. Bhattacharji had erected some building but that this building had not been completed.

We are left therefore in doubt as to how this Press, which was set up in Meerut was located and on such evidence as we have we do not see how we could possibly come to the conclusion that this Baling Press was immoveable property.

We have been referred to the definition of the expression "immoveable property" contained in the General Clauses Act of 1897. This definition has to be read along with the interpretation section of the Transfer of Property Act (section 3) and in particular we have to pay attention to the words in this latter section "attached to earth."

We have mentioned already that there was no clear evidence before us that any building intended to shelter the machinery of this Baling Press was ever completed. But even if we assume that there was such a building it would be difficult for us, in view of this definition, to hold that the machinery which has now been removed to the Punjab and which has been sought to be sold in order to satisfy the claim of these plaintiffs was in any sense immoveable property.

We cannot decide this question on the English law relating to fixtures. We have to pay attention to the definitions in the Indian Statutes.

If there was a building in existence inside which this machinery was sheltered it cannot be said that this machinery was attached to the building for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of the building itself, as is contemplated in clause (c) of the definition in section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act.

It would be difficult in a case of this kind to speak of machinery being attached to a building embedded in the earth for the beneficial enjoyment of the building. On the other hand it would seem more natural to suppose that the building is really put up for the purpose of sheltering the machinery and protecting it from the weather.

Nor again with reference to the definition of immoveable property contained in the General Clauses Act it is possible to say that this machinery was permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth.

Having regard to this definition and to the state of the evidence in the case we have no hesitation in saying that the learned Subordinate Judge was quite correct.

It follows therefore that we cannot interfere with that portion of the decree which declares that the claim in so far as it related to this machinery was beyond time being barred by the six years' rule of limitation.

We come then to the other part of the case. We have it that some of the defendants are the transferees of another item of the mortgaged property named Lalpur.

The Subordinate Judge was of opinion that these plaintiffs could only sell up Lalpur to the extent to which that item was liable under the terms of the mortgage. In other words the Subordinate Judge in accordance with the provisions of section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act distributed the liability of the three items of property as they stood at the time of the mortgage. He was of opinion that the value of Sherpur which the plaintiffs purchased was represented by the figure Rs. 6,000. Lalpur he found was of the value of Rs. 5,000 while the Christy Cotton Baling Press was of the value of Rs. 25,000.

Acting on this principle he has given plaintiffs a decree for a certain sum as principal and a further amount as interest and directed that this amount be realised by the sale of the portion of the village of Lalpur sufficiently to satisfy the decretal amount.

In appeal before us however the argument has been that the plaintiffs are entitled to throw the whole of the mortgage-debt upon mauza Lalpur minus the share to which Sherpur is liable.

The suit in substance is a suit for contribution and the section which regulates the rights of the parties is section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act which lays down that where several properties, whether of one or several owners, are mortgaged to secure one debt such properties are in the absence of a contract to the contrary liable to contribute rateably to the debt secured by the mortgage after deducting from the value of each property the amount of any other encumbrance to which it is subject at the date of the mortgage.

There is in this case no question of a contract to the contrary and consequently applying the principle laid down in section 82 it is evident that the three items of property which were mortgaged under the mortgage of 1910 were liable each to satisfy a rateable proportion of the mortgage debt, the ratio being in proportion to their respective values. We have already indicated the values of these properties as they stood at the time of the mortgage. Sherpur was of the value of Rs. 6,000. Lalpur was of the value of Rs. 5,000, and the Christy Cotton Baling Press was of the value of Rs. 25,000.

It is, therefore, on the basis of the ratio so indicated that the claim of the plaintiffs must be decided. A case in which this principle was laid down is reported in I.L.R., 36 All., 272 (Bhagwan Singh v. Mazhar Ali Khan).

The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the present owners of Lalpur a share of the mortgage debt calculated in accordance with the respective liabilities of the three items of property as defined in section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act. In our opinion this decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is perfectly correct and ought not to be disturbed. The only other ground which is mentioned in the grounds of appeal is one with regard to future interest. We imagine this plea has been taken under some misapprehension. It seems to us that the decree of the court below provides for subsequent interest and subsequent costs in the manner which is usual in the case of decrees for sale under Order 34, rule 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cross-objection which was filed in this case relates to the point which we have already decided in connection with F. A. No. 86 of 1923.

For the reasons already given the cross-objection fails and is dismissed with costs.

This appeal fails too and is dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal and cross-objection dismissed.

Mt. Mulani—Appellant.

v.

Maula Baksh—Respondent.

S.A. No. 513 of 1922, decided on 20th December, 1923, from the decree of District Judge, Mainpuri, dated 9th February, 1923.

(a) Muhammedan Law—Gift—Without delivery of possession gift is void ab initio and there is no limitation to set it aside but limitation starts when possession is got by donee—Limitation Act, Art. 91.

Where a deed of gift is executed by a person governed by the Muhammedan law and the possession of the property comprised in the gift has not been delivered the gift would be void ab initio and no question of limitation will arise in such circumstances. The right of the plaintiff to impeach such a gift can only accrue from the moment when by receipt of possession the gift becomes operative by law. (6 All. 207, Foll.) [P. 371, C. 1.]

(b) Limitation Act, Art. 91—Starting point.

Art. 91 of the Indian Limitation Act provides a period of three years from the date when the facts entitling the plaintiff to have the instrument cancelled or set aside become known to him. (28 Mad. 349, Foll.) [P. 371, C. 1.]

Baleshwari Prasad—for Appellant.

A. P. Dube—for Respondent.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.:—The plaintiff seeks to set aside a deed of gift purporting to have been executed by her in favour of the defendant on the 11th of February, 1914. Her allegation was that the defendant practised fraud on the plaintiff and caused her to execute the deed of gift by the exercise of undue influence over her. The precise nature of the fraud was not specified but it was alleged that certain misrepresentations had been made by the defendant to obtain her consent. It was further alleged that in spite of the deed of gift the plaintiff had continued in possession of the house comprised in the gift.

The defendant denied that any fraud, undue influence or misrepresentation had been committed. He pleaded that he had been in possession of the house from the date of the gift and spent Rs. 150 in making improvements of the house in question and paid Rs. 150 to Balaqi Das who had purchased the rights of Mt. Aliman the daughter of the plaintiff, who was found to be the joint owner of the said house with the plaintiff. There was a further defence that the deed in suit was really a sale for consideration cloaked in the form of a gift to defeat a claim for pre-emption.

The trial court found that the deed in question was nothing more than a gift without consideration and that it was executed under a misapprehension arising out of false promises made by the defendant and gentle persuasion exercised by him and was not consequently binding on the plaintiff. In the course of its judgment it observed that the plaintiff might be said to have been duped or misled but she could not be said to have been put under undue influence, and that the plaintiff had given preference to the defendant who was a very distant relation of her husband in disregard of the claim of her own brother, because the latter had been neglecting her and the former had been attending to her wants and comforts in her old age. In regard to the question of possession the trial court came to the conclusion that the rent of the house in dispute used to be paid to the plaintiff till very recently and that as long as the defendant paid the rent realised from the house to her she was quite pleased with the arrangement she had made, but when the defendant began to neglect her and stopped the payment of the rent to her, her eyes were opened and she sought the help of her brother in getting rid of the transaction. With reference to the other pleas raised by the defendant, the finding of the trial court was that Rs. 150 had actually been spent in improvements and a similar sum in acquiring the rights of Balaqi Das who had purchased the rights of Mt. Aliman, the daughter of the plaintiff. A decree was accordingly passed in favour of the plaintiff for the cancellation of the deed of gift and for the recovery of possession of her share of the house on condition of the plaintiff's paying Rs. 150 to the defendant on account of the improvements effected by the latter and Rs. 150 which the defendant had paid to Balaqi Das for the share of her daughter Mt. Aliman.

The defendant appealed and the plaintiff filed certain cross objections. The whole of the suit was in effect before the lower appellate Court for determination; but the Court confined itself to the question of limitation and without going into the various pleas raised on behalf of either side came to the conclusion that article 91 of the Indian Limitation Act (No. IX of 1908) barred the claim.

It is not possible, however, to determine the question of limitation without going into many of the questions of fact which arise in the suit. The plaintiff had, for instance, alleged that she had remained in possession of the house in dispute in spite of the deed of gift but that allegation was traversed by the defendant. The trial Court had recorded a finding on that point but the lower appellate Court left it undetermined. Where a deed of gift is executed by a person governed by the Muhammedan law and the possession of the property comprised in the gift has not been delivered, the gift would be void ab initio, and as held in Serajul Haq v. Khadim Hussain (1) and Meda Bibi v. Imaman Bibi (2) no question of limitation will arise in such circumstances. The right of the plaintiff to impeach such a gift can only accrue from the moment when by receipt of possession the gift becomes operative by law.

Article 91 of the Indian Limitation Act provides a period of three years from the date, when the facts entitling the plaintiff to have the instrument cancelled or set aside become known to him. The lower appellate Court has not determined when the facts entitling the plaintiff to have the instrument cancelled or set aside became known to her. In Singarappa v. Talari Sanjivappa (3) where the plaintiff executed a sham sale-deed in favour of the defendants, neither party intending that it should be acted upon and four years later the defendants began to set up a claim to ownership on the strength of the deed, it was held that the suit was not barred by article 91 of the Indian Limitation Act, having been brought within three years from the date when the plaintiff apprehended that the defendants had set up title under the instrument. In Petherpermal Chetty v. Muniandy Servai (4), their Lordships of the Privy Council similarly held that where a deed was inoperative it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to have it set aside as a preliminary to his obtaining possession of the property. The plaintiff stated in her deposition that the payment of the rent of the house in dispute was stopped at or about the time when the suit was filed. That fact must therefore be determined.

It has also been urged that the deed of gift was in its very nature revocable under the Muhammedan law, but that point also cannot be determined until the other questions raised in the appeal before the Court below are decided. The parties are sunnis and according to the Hanafi law a gift cannot be revoked after the subject of the gift has increased in value owing to some accession thereto made by the donee, which is inseparable from it.

The appeal is therefore allowed and the decree of the lower appellate Court set aside and the suit remanded to that Court with a direction to reinstate it under its original number and to dispose of it after determining the other points involved in the appeal and the cross-objections. The costs of this appeal will abide the event including fees in this Court on the higher scale.

Mukerji, J.:—I agree that the appeal before the lower appellate Court could not be decided merely on the point of limitation. The other points involved in the appeal require determination. I therefore agree with my learned brother that the appeal must be decreed and on terms stated by him.

Appeal allowed.

Babban Panday—Appellant

v.

Lachhman Chaudhri and another—Respondents.

S.A. No. 1071 of 1922, decided on 30th November, 1923, from the decree of First Class Additional District Judge of Gorakhpur, dated 20th April, 1922.

(a) Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz.

Owing to special instructions given to settlement officers in the wajib-ul-arzes of 1885 in Basti and Gorakhpur Districts the record of custom of pre-emption raises a very strong presumption. [P. 372, C. 1.]

(b) Pre-emption—Custom lapses if property vests in one individual only.

It is not correct to say that if it is shown that certain property in the course of time becomes the exclusive property of an entire family any custom relating to pre-emption must necessarily lapse. The true doctrine is that if the custom of pre-emption exists and if it so happens that the property to which it relates eventually comes into the hands of a single individual proprietor the custom is there and then extinguished. [P. 373, C. 1.]

N. Upadhiya—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.:—We cannot maintain the judgments of the Courts below in this case. We think that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed and that it was established that a custom of pre-emption exists.

The plaintiff brought into Court extracts from the wajib-ul-arzes of 1833, 1860 and 1885 and he also claimed to have in support of his case a decree in which the right of pre-emption had been recognized.

Clearly it lay heavily on the defendants to rebut this evidence led on behalf of the plaintiff.

We have had a number of these Basti cases before us recently and it seems to us that the position regarding these wajib-ul-arzes in Basti and Gorakhpur is not properly appreciated by the Courts there.

It was brought to the notice of the learned Judge of the Court below in this case that the wajib-ul-arz prior to the year 1885 was a document of special importance.

We have in other cases found it necessary to draw attention to the fact that in the Gorakhpur and Basti settlement rules relating to the settlements which were made about the year 1885 the Board of Revenue issued special instructions regarding the preparation of a record of a custom of pre-emption.

Settlement officers were directed to record a custom of pre-emption when the proprietors, being other than Muhammedan proprietors expressly demanded, that a note of the custom should be made and further, proved conclusively, that the custom exists. It seems to us therefore that when we find in a wajib ul-arz prepared under these instructions a statement that a custom exists it must be assumed that the necessary proof was forthcoming before the Settlement Officer before that record was made; in other words, that there was proof which conclusively satisfied the Settlement Officer of the existence of the custom.

It is in our opinion a mistake to treat these documents in the way in which the Courts below seem to treat them. We ought, in dealing with the question of the existence of custom, to begin with the last record. In this instance, the record was prepared in 1885. If it is proved that records of custom are set out in the earlier wajib-ul-arzes of 1860 and 1833, that is corroborative evidence. It is not proper to start with the wajib-ul-arz of 1833 to consider whether it was possible that a custom could have grown up by that time and then to proceed to consider subsequent wajib-ul-arz. The proper starting point is the last waijb-ul-arz.

We have it therefore that there is a very strong presumption here in favour of the existence of custom and it remains to be seen what evidence was forthcoming by way of rebuttal. We disagree entirely with the view of the evidence relating to the history of the village which has been taken by the Court below. It seems to be clear on all hands that this was one of those numerous villages in which there was a superior proprietor and a number of inferior proprietors called birtyas. It would seem that in the earlier short term settlements which were made before the first regular settlement came to be made under the Regulation of 1833, the revenue engagements were taken from the superior proprietor. A reference to the Gazetteer shows that in the earlier days of the British administration this was the policy of the Government. Later on however, that policy was changed and the practice sprang up of taking the revenue engagement from the inferior proprietor or birtya and providing for the rights of the superior proprietor by declaring that a certain amount of malikana shall be payable to him.

This is what has happened in the present case. It appears that in the year 1837 a certain petition was put in by a member of a family residing in this village. He represented that he himself and his co-sharers had been birtyas in this village and had been in possession since the time of the Nawab Wazir of Oudh, that is to say, since before the year 1800.

The object of this petition was to obtain the revenue engagement, the birtyas apparently desiring, that the settlement should be made with them and not as heretofore, with the superior proprietor. There is nothing whatever in this petition to indicate that it was impossible in any way that a custom of pre-emption should have grown up by that time or subsequently. It is not correct to say that if it is shown that certain property in the course of time becomes the exclusive property of an entire family any custom relating to pre-emption must necessarily lapse. The true doctrine is that if the custom of pre-emption exists and if it so happens that the property to which it relates eventually comes into the hands of a single individual proprietor the custom is there and then extinguished. That however is not the case here for, as we have pointed out, in the application which was made in the year 1837 the applicant stated that there were other people who were co-sharers with himself.

On all hands therefore, it is clear that the very strong presumption in favour of the existence of custom which is to be based upon the wajib-ul-arz prepared in the year 1885 has not in any way been overturned by the evidence of the history of the village. The case to our mind is a perfectly clear one, and as we have said, we must hold that the existence of the custom should on this evidence, have been held to be established.

There remains the question of the consideration. It is stated in the sale-deed that the property was being sold for the sum of Rs. 2,999. The allegation of the plaintiff was that the true consideration was only Rs. 1,100.

The Court of first instance found on this issue that the genuine consideration for the sale was a sum of Rs. 1,647 only.

When the plaintiff went in appeal the question of consideration was raised again, but in view of the finding to which the learned Judge came regarding the existence of the custom, he did not consider it necessary to decide this issue. It will now be necessary for us to remit an issue to the learned District Judge asking him to find the true consideration for the sale now sought to be pre-empted. No further evidence will be taken. The finding of the learned Judge ought to be returned to us with as little delay as possible, and ten days from the date of the receipt of the learned Judge's finding will be allowed to the parties to file objections.

Case remitted.

Bisal Singh and others—Defendants-Appellants

v.

Roshan Lal and another—Plaintiffs-Respondents.

S. A. No. 1000 of 1922, decided on 21st January, 1924, from a decree of District Judge, Allahabad.

Registration Act, S. 28—Non-existence of any property within the jurisdicton of the Sub-Registrar invalididates registration even in absence of fraud by mortgagee.

Where it was admitted that the registered deed included a house which in fact never existed and which alone gave jurisdiction to the Sub-Registrar to register it held, that the registration was invalid though the mortgagee was no party to the fraud committed on the law of registration and it was the mortgagor who was soley to be blamed in the matter. The mortgagee himself was indifferent as to the value or nature of the property. The property being non-existent within the jurdisdiction of the Sub-Registrar he had no jurisdiction to register the deed. [P. 374, C. 2.]

P. L. Bannerji—for Appellants.

Ramuda Prosad—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.:—The facts which have given rise to this appeal are these. Two persons Someshwar and Drigbijai executed the mortgage on which the suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought. The deed was executed on the 4th of June, 1907. Someshwar is dead and the mortgagee Kandhai Lal, is also dead. Kandhai Lal's sons sued Someshwar's sons and Drigbijai for recovery of money on foot of the bond. The defences taken, inter alia, were that the deed had not been properly attested and that it was not properly registered. The lower appellate Court found that the deed had been properly attested and as to the registration it found that the properties mortgaged included a house in village Ghauspur Khathola pergana Chail which never in fact existed. It is common ground that it was owing to the inclusion of this house into the mortgage-deed that the Sub-Registrar of Chail alias Allahabad had the jurisdiction to register it. The learned District Judge also found or purported to find that the mortgagee was no party to the fraud committed on the law of registration and that it was the mortgagors who were solely to blame in the matter.

In this Court it has been urged that the deed was not properly attested, that the property which was found to be fictitious was never intended to be security for the money and that, it must be inferred therefore that it was included simply for the sake of registration. Further, it is urged that, whatever the intention of the mortgagee may have been, the law has been infringed and the registration cannot be held to be good. One more point was taken in the grounds of appeal, namely, ground No. 5. But it has not been pressed.

As to the attestation it is clear the learned District Judge believed the marginal witness who swore that the executants signed the deed before him. The finding therefore of the Court below must be upheld.

On the question of registration it appears to me that it is difficult to hold with the Court below that the mortgagee was an entirely innocent person in the matter. It being an admitted fact that, the property did not exist, it follows that the mortgagee never had a look at the property in order to ascertain whether it should form an adequate security or it should form with the other properties mortgaged an adequate security for the money he was going to advance. So far therefore as he himself was concerned he was indifferent as to the value or nature of the property. In this state of things the only legitimate inference to be drawn is that the property was included for the purposes of registration and not for the purposes of security. It has been urged by the learned Counsel for the respondents that this is really going against the finding of fact by the lower appellate Court. But the so-called finding of the learned District Judge is really an inference to be drawn from the proved facts. There is no direct evidence referred to by the Court below that the mortgagee acted on a particular representation and what that representation was. The defendant Drigbijai Singh gave evidence to the effect that the mortgagee had requested that the property should be included in the mortgage, but that evidence was disbelieved by both the Courts below. The discarding of that evidence does not give the result that it was proved by any positive evidence that the mortgagee was unaware of the fact that the property did not eixist. As I have said, he was prefectly indifferent as to whether the property existed or not. If that was the case, the only object with which the property could have been included was the obtaining of registration in the office of Sub-Registrar of Allahabad. It may be (but there is no evidence to prove it) that the mortgagors said that they had a property within the jurisdiction of Sub-Registrar of Allahabad and if that was included the registration could be effected at Allahabad and further it may be the case that the mortgagee accepted those words and agreed that for the purposes of registration that property might be included. This is the utmost view that may be surmised in favour of the mortgagee. But the question is, does it absolve him from his responsibility in the matter?

It is conceded that if the mortgagee was aware of the fact that the property alleged to be in Chail did not exist, the registration would be void. Now, assuming that the mortgagee believed that the property really existed but he allowed it to be included with the other property in the deed, in order that the Sub-Registrar of Allahabad might have jurisdiction, the question would be whether the registration is valid. In my opinion the law on the point is very clearly stated in section 28 of the Registration Act and it simply says that to give the Sub-Registrar jurisdiction the property included in the deed or a part of it must be situated within the jurisdiction of that officer. No question of fraud by one party or the other enters into the language of the law. The question of fraud may be pleaded only to stop a party from raising a plea, but the jurisdiction of a registering officer cannot come into play simply because one of the parties to a transaction has been guilty of fraud. There was no property within the jurisdiction of the Sub-Registrar of Allahabad and in my opinion it follows as clearly as possible that he had no jurisdiction to register the deed. There is no case law which deals directly with the point. In every case that has been brought to my notice, the inference was that the mortgagee was more or less culpable. Such an inference is really irresistible and the case which I am asked to suppose is practically impossible to accept. I am however of opinion that assuming even that the mortgagee was absolutely innocent in the matter that fact would not give the Sub-Registrar of Allahabad jurisdiction to register the deed. The result must follow namely that the deed is inoperative. It may be that the mortgagors have laid themselves open to prosecution or a suit for damages, but that is a different matter.

The result is that the appeal succeeds. I set aside the decrees of the Courts below and dismiss the suit of the plaintiffs respondents with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

S. A. No. 898 of 1922, decided on 30th November, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Muzaffarnagar at Meerut, dated 20th March, 1922.

Words—Hissedaran shikmi.

Hissedaran shikmi means co-sharers in the same khata, the khata being a smaller sub-division of a patti. (5 A.L.J. 52, Diss.)

Nehal Chand—for Appellant.

Gulzari Lal—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.:—This appeal raises a somewhat difficult question of interpretation in connection with the provisions of a certain wajib-ul-arz relating to pre-emption.

According to what is stated in the wajib-ul-arz, on the occasion of a transfer, the first right to take the property is given to a class which is defined in the wajib-ul-arz as "shurkayan shikmi". It is provided that in case the members of the first class decline to accept the offer of the property then the offer is to be made to the second class of persons who are described as "digar malikan thok o mahal ke". A great deal of controversy has arisen regarding the meaning to be attached to the words "shurkayan shikmi". We have been referred to a decision of a Bench of this Court in Abdul Shakur v. Mundal (1). In that case it was sought to attribute to the expression "hissedaran shikmi" a meaning derived from blood relationship. In other words the suggestion was that hissedaran shikmi were people who had issued from the same "shikam"; that is to say the expression was used in the same sense as the English expression "uterine brothers."

This interpretation was definitely rejected by both Judges in that case and on the interpretation of the wajib-ul-arz in that case it was held that "hissedaran shikmi" meant in that particular case co-sharers in the same khata, the khata being a smaller sub-division of a patti. A patti is in the ordinary acceptance of the term a smaller division than the thok.

On the other hand it was decided by another Bench of this Court in the case (Bahal Singh v. Mubarak-un-nissa (2) that the words "shikmi shurkayan" is intended to denote relatives by blood and not co-sharers in any sub-division of a mahal. We have, therefore, divergence of opinion regarding the matter now before us and it is open to us to take our own course. The interpretation put on this expression in the case in 5 A.L.J. 2 does not commend itself to us.

We cannot agree that in any circumstances the expression "shikmi shurkayan" was ever intended to apply to persons who are connected by blood relation.

We agree with the view which was taken in the earlier case and we therefore, hold that in the present case the words "shurkayan shikmi" should be interpreted in a similar sense.

It is indeed true that the language of the wajib-ul-arz with which we are now dealing is not identical with the language of the document which was before the earlier Bench but having regard to all the circumstances it seems to us that the only meaning of which the expression is susceptible here is the meaning which was given to it in the judgment of Sir Arthur Strachey and Mr. Justice Banerji.

If we look at the language of the wajib-ul-arz itself this construction appears to be the only reasonable one.

We have already stated that the second class of pre-emptors consists of "other proprietors of the thok and mahal".

It follows from the use of the word "digar" in the second category that the persons who are described in the first class as "shurkayan shikmi" must also be proprietors of the thok (malikan thok).

How then are we to distinguish between the proprietors of a thok who are specified in the second division? There must obviously be some basis of classification, and in our opinion that basis is to be found in the word "shikmi". And interpreting that expression it seems to us that the only reasonable meaning which it can bear is that, the persons who are described as "shurkayan shikmi" are persons who, being proprietors in the thok, are brought into a closer relationship than proprietors of the thok by being included in a sub-division of the thok as in this instance, a khata. The principle of decision which was adopted in the earlier of the two reported cases applies here. We quote the following from the judgment of the learned Chief Justice in that case (see 23 All. 262) :—

---

(1) (1901) 23 All. 260.

(2) (1908) 30 All. 77.

"The primary idea as Mr. Justice "Banerji has said, is inclusion; that is to "say, the hissedaran shikmi must in some "way or other be connected with the "vendor by reference to inclusion in some-"thing which contains them both, such as, "in the case before us, in this khata in "which the shares of both are included".

Applying this interpretation to the wajib-ul-arz now before us, we must hold that the decision of the Court below is erroneous. The facts are these:—The sale sought to be pre-empted was made on the 2nd January, 1920, and looking at the sale-deed it appears that two items of property were sold, namely, items out of two distinct khewats or sub-divisions of the thok, namely, Nos. 265 and 269.

It is proved beyond all dispute that the plaintiff in this case and the vendor are co-sharers in one of these khewats, namely, No. 269.

At the time this transfer was made the purchaser was a stranger to the village but subsequently he acquired by a gift a share in thok Ansarayan in khewat No. 323.

It may be mentioned that khewats Nos. 265 and 269 are also in thok Ansarayan.

This property which the vendee has acquired has undoubtedly constituted him one of the proprietors of the thok, and unless the plaintiff has got a superior right the suit must fail.

For the reasons given we think that the plaintiff must be deemed to have a superior right with respect to the item of property comprised in khewat No. 269. The reason is that both the plaintiff and the vendor are linked more closely together by their being included in one khewat or khata. In our view of the case therefore the correct decision should be that the plaintiff is entitled to have his claim decreed regarding the item of property sold in khewat No. 269.

As regards the item comprised in khewat No. 265 he is in no better position than the vendee and the suit regarding that item should be dismissed.

The result is that the case must be sent back to the lower appellate Court for decision of the suit on this basis. The Court will now proceed to decide the other questions outstanding between the parties. Costs will abide the event.

Case remanded.

Civ. Rev. No. 49 of 1923, decided on 12th February, 1924, from the Order of District Judge, Cawnpore.

Appeal—Conditional or provisional order.

An order which is either conditional or provisional and does not result in a final decree is not appealable. [P. 377, C. 2.]

Civ. Pro. Code, S. 141—Does not apply to Succession Certificate Act except so far as Ss. 19 and 26 make it applicable.

Civ. Pro. Code does not apply to proceedings under Succession Certificate Act which is not analogous to Guardians and Wards Act or Bengal Tenancy Act to which the Civ. Pro. Code has been held to apply. Therefore S. 141 does not apply except in so far as it is expressly introduced by S. 19 (3) and as a corollary by S. 26 (3) of the Succession Certificate Act. A Succession Certificate Court has no jurisdiction to appoint a Receiver. [P. 378, C. 1.]

K. N. Katju and I. B. Bannerji—for Applicant.

P. L. Bannerji—for Opposite party.

Walsh, J.:—This is a very pretty legislative knot. A dispute has arisen between two alleged members of a family over an apparently substantial estate left by Mt. Basanti the widow of Bansidhar deceased. Some portion of the property consists of uncollected rents, that is to say, arrears of rent, and also of rents accruing due from the occupiers of various tenancies held under the deceased. Mt. Basanti made a will, which, if it is a valid will, can, on proper proceedings being taken, be admitted to probate. The present applicant, in September 1922, applied for a succession certificate under the Succession Certificate Act, claiming to be the legal representative of the deceased lady, and that he was desirous of collecting the rent from the tenants, who would be protected in paying their rents to him in the event of his obtaining a succession certificate from the Court. Nor could he obtain a decree in any suit against the tenants for rent due to the deceased's estate without producing a succession certificate in the trial Court. Unfortunately, as is too often the case, this comparatively simple piece of machinery for obtaining the necessary certificate in a kind of summary way, for which purpose the Succession Certificate Act of 1889 was elaborately devised, hung fire, and owing, either possibly to the Court below having more work to do than it could get through, or to its failure to recognise the urgency of summary applications of this kind, the month of February, 1923, arrived, five months having elapsed during which nothing whatever was done. One can understand the applicant after such delay looking round to see how best he could secure that which he really wanted. He complains in the application, with which we now have to deal, that these rents, or some of them, are being improperly withheld and are becoming time barred, or in danger of becoming time barred. It is a fact that the provisions of the law enable a person in such a position to protect himself if he is properly advised. The applicant could have brought suits within the period allowed by limitation against all the debtors, and could have either asked the Court to postpone granting decrees, if he was entitled to decrees, until he had obtained the necessary certificate or applied to the certificate Court, as an urgent matter, to expedite the proceedings which had been already pending, as we have said, five months. Unfortunately he seems to have been badly advised, or at any rate advised to take the novel procedure which has been accepted by the lower Court, and we have to deal with the matter as it stands. On the 23rd of February, 1923, he applied for the appointment of a Receiver to the Court in which the succession certificate matter was still pending. He made that application against the objector who was objecting to his obtaining a succession certificate, and each party filed a statement containing their views of the merits, and a perusal of these documents shows that the real dispute was between these two persons as to who was to collect the rent, and the applicant objected to the objector being allowed to collect rent unless he gave adequate security, he being a person in a Native State, and generally according to the applicant's allegation, not to be trusted and impecunious. On that footing the applicant was desirous to have the appointment of a Receiver, and the Court has acceded to that view of the matter, and without actually appointing a Receiver has given the objector the option of giving security. Nobody can doubt that if the application had been made in a pending suit, it was a reasonable application to make, and that on the merits it was both plausible and attractive. But we have to decide whether it was an application which the Court below had any right to entertain at all. The matter being novel and difficult, the objector has brought in before this Court both by way of appeal and by way of revision. With regard to the right of appeal, it seems to be established by a course of decisions in this Court that there is no such right where the order of the Court below is either conditional or provisional, and does not eventuate in a final order. The substantial matter therefore which we have to decide is whether we have jurisdiction to entertain the revision which challenges the jurisdiction of the lower Court to entertain this application. Taking for convenience sake the latter consideration first, it is argued by Mr. Pearey Lal Banerji in defence of the order, that Order 40, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure which contains the whole of the law in India with reference to the appointment of Receivers, is not now under the Code of 1908, whatever it was before, confined only to cases in which a suit is pending. He cites in justification of that view the case of Bai Jamnabhai, wife of Liladhar Khetsey (1), in which it was held that a Receiver might be appointed in an application made under section 12 of the Guardians and Ward Act. Section 12 of the Guardians and Wards Act enables the Court under that Act to make orders for the protection of the property, and section 141 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies the provisions of the Code generally to all proceedings in any Court of civil jurisdiction, so far as they can be made applicable. A similar view has been taken in the case of Asadali Chowdhury v. Mahomed Hossain Chowdhury (2), with regard to an application under section 93 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. These cases, however, do not cover the whole ground. It is necessary to consider the scope of the Succession Certificate Act in order to see whether the general provisions of the Civil Procedure Code can be worked or introduced into the machinery under the Succession Certificate Act, or in other words, whether section 141 of the Code of Civil Procedure can be made applicable. The Succession Certificate Act is a provision within a very small compass enacted for a specific purpose. The title describes it as "an act to facilitate the collection to debts on successions, and afford protection to parties paying debts to the representatives of deceased persons." Section 1 (4) provides that a certificate is not to be granted in respect of any debt in which a right can be established by probate under two Acts specifically mentioned. It so happens that neither of these cases apply to the will of Mt. Basanti, which is a will governed by the Probate and Administration Act, but undoubtedly Letters of Administration with a copy of the will annexed could be obtained of her will within the meaning of the latter part of section 1 (4). It is, therefore, doubtful whether it is a case in which the Court had any right to grant a certificate at all. The procedure appears to us to be very carefully prescribed and restricted. Where assistance from the Code is required, it is introduced by an express enactment, for example, in section 6 governing the verification of the application. The provision for service and so on is contained in section 7, and there is no further reference to the Code except in section 19 (3), which applies to section 141 (old section 647) only so far as it relates to the provisions for reference and review contained in old chapters 46 and 47 of the Code. We, therefore, come to the conclusion that we cannot treat this Act as analogous to the other Acts, like the Guardians and Wards Act and the Bengal Tenancy Act, to which the general provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, have been held to apply, and that we are unable to see that section 141 can be made applicable to the Succession Certificate Act except in so far as it is expressly introduced by section 19 (3) and also as corollary by section 26 (3). The result is that in our view it is not competent for a Court sitting as a Succession Certificate Court, working the provisions of the Succession Certificate Act, to entertain an application for the appointment of a Receiver, and that in doing so the Court below acted without jurisdiction.

Mr. Pearey Lal Banerji, however, as a last resort contended that if this was so, the logical result was that none of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure would be applicable at all, including section 115, known as the revision section, and that, therefore, we are prohibited by our own interpretation of the Succession Certificate Act from applying the machinery provided in section 115. The answer to this ingenious suggestion is in our opinion as follows:—We hold that the general provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure do not apply to the Court below sitting as a Court administering the Succession Certificate Act. But in our opinion they do apply to the High Court sitting as such which is vested with jurisdiction to send for the record in any case decided by an inferior Court, and if it has acted without jurisdiction, to set aside its order. Finally Mr. Pearey Lal Banerji, contended that there was no decision, although the Court granted in substance what he asked. We do not think it is necessary to go so far as to examine the ultimate decision of the lower Court in these proceedings. The difficulty arose at an earlier stage. The Court had no business to entertain this application at all. It ought to have thrown it out on the ground of absence of jurisdiction. It could not have entertained it without first deciding that it had jurisdiction to do so. It has so decided and in our view it has decided wrongly and therefore has exercised a jurisdiction which did not belong to it. On these grounds the revision must be allowed and the order quashed. Under the circumstances both parties will pay their own costs. Let the record be sent back to the lower Court with a copy of this judgment and a direction to such Court to proceed without delay to dispose of the application for a succession certificate. We are now in the year 1924 and this application which was started in September, 1922, is still pending. We would impress upon the lower Court and all lower Courts the importance of dealing with summary and urgent matters as expeditiously as possible. These continual delays, particularly in what may be called interlocutory machinery, are largely responsible for the complaints which are made about the general delay of litigation in this province.

The appeal of course will be formally dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.
Revision allowed.

Mahabir Prosad Misir—Decree-holder-Appellant

v.

Amla Prasad Rai and others—Judgment-debtors-Respondents.

Ex. S. A. No. 718 of 1923, decided on 8th February, 1924, from the decree of Second Additional Judge of Gorakhpore.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Family business—Manager can contract debts for business which is not ancestral but which is for the benefit of the family.

There is no difference between an ancestral and a non-ancestral business. The ordinary presumption is that money required for carrying on family business is for family necessity and that the business is carried with the consent and acquiescence of all the members of the family. Creditor therefore need not prove legal necessity or family benefit for each advance. The manager has the power to contract debts for the purpose of the family business. (34 All. 135, Dist ; 6 C.W.N. 429, Expl. and Dist.). [P. 380, C. 1].

N. P. Asthana—for Appellant.

Sankar Saran—for Respondents.

Sulaiman, J.:—This is an appeal by a decree holder arising out of certain execution proceedings. In 1907 the objectors' father Ram Piare Rai executed a mortgage-deed in favour of the decree-holder for a sum of Rs. 1,499. A suit was brought on the basis of this deed and a preliminary decree was passed on the 23rd of August, 1918. This was made absolute on the 27th of March, 1919. While an application for execution of this final decree was pending Ram Piare Rai, the mortgagor, died on the 2nd of May, 1919. His sons were brought on the record as his representatives and they raised the objection that the debt incurred by Ram Piare Rai had not been incurred for any family necessity and was not binding on them. Parties adduced evidence on the question raised and the Court of first instance came to the conclusion that the debt had been contracted in connection with the business for the purchase and sale of elephants, which Ram Piare Rai had been conducting. The learned Subordinate Judge was fully satisfied that "the money was borrowed for the elephant business which Ram Piare Rai did for the family benefit and not for the sake of his hobby." The objections were accordingly disallowed by him. On appeal by the judgment-debtors the lower appellate Court has allowed the objections. On the question of fact raised, it came to the conclusion that a business for the purchase and sale of elephants had been started by the objectors' father some 7 or 8 years before the mortgage in question, and that it was in connection with that business that the father borrowed the money. It was distinctly of opinion that the family must have benefited from any resultant profits out of the elephant trade assuming that there was any such profits. It, however, held that the business not having been an ancient family business or ancestral business the debt incurred by the agent would not be binding on the other members of the family.

The decree-holder has come up in appeal and the finding of the lower appellate Court on the question of law raised is challenged. The learned Additional District Judge has drawn a distinction between a simple debt and a mortgage-debt and has expressed the view that if it had been a case of a simple debt it would have been binding.

The point which we have to consider is whether the amount borrowed by the manager of a Hindu family in connection with a family business is such as is binding on the other members of the family. The decree-holder is not seeking to enforce the debt against the sons on the ground of any pious obligation of theirs. It is well understood that the manager of a Hindu family has power to contract debts for the purposes of a family business and this power is well recognised. It is not necessary that such business should necessarily be an ancestral one. So long as it is not a separate business of the managar himself and it is a family business carried on for the benefit of the family, the debts incurred for carrying it on would be binding on the whole family and it is by no means incumbent on the creditor to prove that the family actually benefited out of that transaction. On principle it would make no difference whether it is or it is not an ancestral business. The ordinary presumption would be that the money required for the carrying on of the business is required for a family necessity and the business is carried on with the consent and acquiescence of all the members of the family. If the creditors were called upon to prove legal necessity or family benefit for each such advance it would practically be impossible for a Hindu family to carry on any business, as no one would ever give it credit.

We are fortified in this view by the observations contained in a number of cases to which we may briefly refer.

In the case of Johurra Bibee v. Sreegopal Misser (1) at page 475 the view taken in the case of Ramlal Thakursidas v. Lakmichand (2) was quoted with approval, that "persons carrying on a family business in the profits of which all the members of the family would participate must have authority to pledge the joint family property and credit for the ordinary purposes of the business, and therefore that debts honestly incurred in carrying on such business must override the rights of all members of the joint family in property acquired with funds derived from the joint business. In other words it seems to me that those who claim to participate in the benefits must also be subject to the liabilities of the joint business".

This case was approved of by a Bench of the same Court in the case of Bemola Dossee v. Mohun Dossee (3) which was also a case of a family business and not necessarily an ancestral business. Though it was a case under the Diabhaga Law it was pointed out that "adult members of an undivided Hindu family who have an interest in a family business carried on by the managing members of the family and who are maintained out of the profits of such business must, in the absence of evidence, be taken to possess the knowledge that the business might require financing and to have consented to such financing. Where, therefore, a managing member of such a family in carrying on the family business obtains an advance necessary for the purpose of the business by pledging the joint family property, the mortgage is binding on all the members of the partnership".

The same principle was laid down in the case of Sakrabhai v. Maganlal (4) which however was a case where a Hindu widow had contracted debts on the credit of the assets of the business to which she had succeeded as the heiress of her deceased husband.

In the case of Ragunathji Tarachand v. The Bank of Bombay (5) it was remarked that "in connection with the legal position of an ancestral firm in its dealings with the outside world of commerce, the test to be applied in such cases is rather the apparent authority of the manager than the actual necessity of the family. And that is a perfectly reasonable position, for while there is no absolute necessity for the family to trade at all, when once the family trade is admitted, all usual acts done in the normal course of carrying it on may be considered necessary to the trade. If this reason is right then one passes on from the ordinary Hindu Law as to a manager's power of alienation to the law of partnership".

The case of the Oudh Court reported as Baba Din v. Bansraj (6) is clearly in point. The learned Additional Judicial Commissioner following the Bombay case of Raghunathji Tarchand v. The Bank of Bombay (5) held that "where a joint Hindu family carries on a business or profession and maintains itself by means of it, the member who manages it for the family has an implied authority to contract debts for its purposes, and the creditor is not bound to enquire into the finances of the business, as long as that business forms the purpose of the debts, in order to bind the whole family thereby, because the power to contract debts is incidental to the carrying on of the business, from which the family derives its means of subsistence and support". There too the business was not an ancestral or an ancient business but had been started only 9 or 10 years prior to the debt.

The learned Vakil for the respondents has strongly relied on two cases. The first one is the case of D. McLaren Morrison v. S. Verschoyle (7). That case however on the facts is clearly distinguishable. At page 437 it was remarked that "Bepin made use of the name of the firm for his own purpose after the year 1897, but the business as a business undoubtedly was determined when the mill ceased to work and from that time forward there was no necessity to borrow money for the purchase of castor seed in connection with the mill". Again at page 458 it was clearly pointed out that this business was not the ancestral business but an entirely new business and the advances made by the plaintiffs to Bepin were not made in the course of the ordinary transactions of the ancestral business and were not made for the benefit of the joint family at all.

In the same way the case of Ganpat Rai v. Munni Lal (8) is distinguishable. The learned Judges in that case disagreed with the trial Court and held that the debts for the payment of which the mortgage-deed had been executed were gambling debts and could not therefore be regarded as debts contracted by the mortgagor in his capacity of a manager of a firm or family in the course of the ordinary business of the firm or family. All that was held was that there was no presumption that a debt contracted by the manager of a Hindu family or firm was contracted for the benefit of the family or firm. On the facts found in that case there can be no doubt that the sons were not bound by that debt.

On the findings arrived at by the learned Additional District Judge there can be no doubt that this amount had been borrowed by the father in order to carry on the family trade of purchase and sale of elephants, that this was not an isolated transaction but was in connection with the business which had been going on for some 7 or 8 years prior to the transaction and that this was the business from which the other members of the family were likely to benefit if there were any profits. On these findings we are of opinion that the mortgagors cannot escape their liability.

The result therefore is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Court below is set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Transfer of key of a locked box to a friendly co-occupant does not divest the owner of his possession. [P. 384, C. 1.]

The Government Advocate—for Crown.

Kumuda Prasad—for Respondent.

Walsh, J.:—This is an appeal by Government against an order of acquittal by a first class Magistrate, dated the 31st of August, 1923. The whole case turns upon the question of unlawful possession of some cocaine found in a certain house in the city of Allahabad. There has been a previous prosecution and an acquittal. One Bishun, together with his sister Musammat Kishun Piari, and Ganesh, who is believed to be his maternal uncle, were charged with the wrongful possession of this cocaine. In that case the present defendant one Benarsi, who is said to be 60 years of age and is also believed to be related to Bishun although he strenuously denies it, gave evidence for the defence, and his statement on that occasion has been used against him in this case. In the order of acquittal, the Magistrate who tried the previous case directed that proceedings against Banarsi should be instituted. It was natural therefore, and right, that the case should be heard and disposed of by another Magistrate. In our view the appeal must succeed on the ground that the facts proved against the defendant are particularly conclusive, and that the Magistrate unfortunately instead of taking a broad common sense view of the facts, which could not be explained except upon the hypothesis of guilt, has cut up the case into small pieces which he has disposed of one by one by a series of technical fallacies.

The matter is perfectly simple. In this house No. 70, Sarai Mir Khan in the city of Allahabad resides from time to time a varied assortment of individuals whose relationship to one another whether by blood or by matrimony or by contract of tenancy or otherwise, seems to be wrapped in some obscurity. A prominent person known in connection with this collection of people who frequent this house is the person Bishun who was acquitted. He is said to be a junior member of the family and the men who handles the wealth, and the evidence in this case of one of the occupants of the house is that Bishun was well-to-do. The City Excise Authorities had reason to suspect that the money was not unconnected with illicit traffic in cocaine and that the house No. 70 belonged to Bishun. As the Inspector very fairly said in this case when Banarsi was on trial, everthing pointed to the house being in the possession of Bishun. A raid was made upon the house and the result of the search was that in one room cocaine was found in a coat hanging up on a peg on the wall, and in another room was found a locked wooden box which in addition to containing other thinks contained a small tin box in which cocaine was also discovered. There were a pair of scales also in the room and an empty phial, both of which articles, innocent in themselves, might have had no connection with cocaine. But on the other hand there is no evidence of any legitimate trade going on, or of the existence of any material with reference to which either a phial or scales would be useful except this cocaine, and as this was a house in the crowded part of a crowded city, the reasonable presumption is that traffic in cocaine, that is to say in selling cocaine in small quantities, as we say by retail, was going on in that place to persons who wanted it in small quantities. That is to say the indications are in favour not of a store for safe keeping and removal to some other place on a large scale, but rather in favour of a small trade going on with retail customers. We attach great importance to that feature of the case, because to enable it to be done secretly and to evade any possible search, it would be necessary to have the stuff well hidden and yet in an accessible place. It has this further bearing upon the case that it follows that if that inference is correct, it was impossible for a trade of that kind to be going on from day to day without the knowledge of the occupants who had access to the room where the cocaine was discovered. It also follows that mere temporary absence for three or four days from the premises would by no means afford an answer, which it might otherwise do in the case of cocaine suddenly introduced into the building of a person charged with guilty possession.

The present accused gave evidence on the charge against Bishun. The learned Magistrate excluded that sworn statement of Banarsi's altogether as inadmissible, and he has made a terrible mess of the sections applicable. The evidence was not tendered as a confession or as an admission of guilt, but as a statement of fact by the accused himself amounting to an admission of a very relevant fact connected with the discovery, of the cocaine, namely, the occupation of the house and the possession of a locked box. The evidence was properly proved by bringing the previous statement on the record of this case, and also by the direct testimony of the Inspector, and the Magistrate entirely misunderstands both the purpose for which it was tendered, and the plain meaning of section 21 of the Evidence Act which made it admissible.

It is necessary to pause here to deal with an ingenious argument now raised for the first time by Banarsi's Counsel, namely that under section 132, the answers which Banarsi gave when he was examined in Bishun's case being such as he was not excused from giving, were answers which he was compelled to give, and therefore they could not he proved against him in a criminal proceeding. That argument undoubtedly raises a serious question. The proviso in this instance, as in most other cases, really depends upon the right meaning to be given to the word "compelled". It has been held that the word "compelled" involves the necessity of a formal objection to giving the answer, and an order made at the time to the witness compelling him to answer. We are of opinion that that is too narrow an interpretation. The matter has been recently discussed in two or three cases, particularly by a member of this Court in the case of Emperor v. Ganga Sahai (1), in which the judgment quotes with approval a sentence from Mr. Justice Piggott's judgment in the case of Kallu v. Sital (2) and we are of opinion that the interpretation put upon the word "compelled" in the former case is right and ought to be followed. Subsequently Mr. Justice Tudball in the case of Emperor v. Chatur Singh (3) following the case of Emperor v. Ganga Sahai (1) and Mr. Justice Piggott's dictum in the case of Kallu v. Sital (2) held that it was impossible to deny that in the case of ordinary laymen unacquainted with the technical terms of this section, they were compelled to answer on oath questions put either by the Court or by the counsel, especially when the question is relevant to the case. Mr. Justice Tudball's view was that a common sense meaning should be given to the word "compelled". In our view this really means that compulsion under that section is a question of fact. It by no means follows that the witness is compelled to answer every question put by counsel, and Mr. Justice Tudball did not say so. But he may, of course, be compelled in particular cases to answer questions put by counsel, and in such cases the section is clearly applicable. We can only say that there is no evidence of any compulsion in this case at all. It is highly unlikely that Banarsi acted under any compulsion. The point was not taken until it was too late, but the probability is that whether Banarsi is the uncle, or whether he is not, he was a voluntary if not enthusiastic witness making statements which he thought, as they did, would satisfy the Court of Bishun's innocence. We are of opinion, therefore, that this statement is not excluded by section 132. What he says does not come to very much. Its importance is that it cannot be controverted. He said that the locked box was his, and he repeated the statement at this trial. He also said, which is even more important, that the house was in his occupation. That statement is also confirmed by the statement of Ganesh, who was an occupant of the house, and who was acquitted in the previous case. He gets out of the inference which would be otherwise drawn against a man in whose locked box cocaine is found, or in whose coat there are packets of cocaine, by alleging that the coat belongs to his son, and that the tin box in which cocaine actually was secreted, although found in the locked box of the accused, was not in fact his. Both these statements are very likely true, but they really do not carry the matter any further than the fact admitted by himself. He was away at the time and therefore not in physical possession either of the coat or of the locked box, but it is unlikely that, if he went away for four days, he did not leave the key of the locked box in the possession of somebody else so that access could be obtained to it. But the coat is said to belong to his son Kandhai, and unfortunately Kandhai was not so anxious, as Banarsi had been in the previous charge, to tell the Court his view of the possession of the coat and the cocaine that was found therein. Nor has Banarsi attempted to give any explanation, or to call any evidence to explain, how it was that in his unfortunate absence in Benares during these four days, people living in this house in apparent harmony, friendship, and to some extent at any rate close blood relationship with him, should have planted upon him by means of putting into his locked box a tin box containing cocaine, or in other words damning evidence of traffic in this illicit substance. Nor has he attempted to call any evidence to explain how and why any one did the same thing with the son's coat. It is not improbable that the persons in the house at the time of the arrival of the search party seized upon the coat pocket as the most convenient place for rapidly disposing of the substance which they had then in a saleable form.

It is because of the very difficulty which arises in a case of this kind, where you have a body of persons, most of whom are related to one another, living jointly, and jointly living on the big profits which are made out of this substance, that the Legislature has enacted the provisions which are relied upon by the prosecution in this case. It is only natural that in a case of this kind, whenever a charge is made, efforts should be made by other members of the joint concern to prove that the person charged is the one person in the whole concern who had nothing whatever to do with it. There is always danger in doing so as Banarsi has now discovered in his own case. But that his own statement, and the evidence in this case independently of his own statement, were sufficient to raise the presumption against him under this section, admits of no possible doubt. Section 71 provides that it shall be presumed until the contrary is proved that the accused person has committed an offence, namely in this case possessing the excisable article, when possession of which he is unable to account satisfactorily is established against him. The Magistrate says that there is not an iota of evidence of the cocaine being in the possession of Banarsi. Can the possession, asked the Magistrate, at the time of the search be said to be his when all the evidence points to the contrary, and he relies upon the statement that the key of the box was in the possession of Bishun. The key of the box, if the locked box belonged to Banarsi and was in the house occupied by him, could only be in the possession of Bishun with the authority and consent of Banarsi, and it is a narrow and almost foolish view to take to hold that the transfer of the key has the effect of dispossessing the owner of the box. All of us have things in our possession, for example, kitchen utensils in the kitchen house, which we seldom see and never touch, but they are in the possession of our cooks as our agents. The result is, possession is established by both direct evidence and by the admissions of the accused, and no attempt has been made to account for it.

The appeal must be allowed and Banarsi must be convicted of being in unlawful possession of this cocaine in the box and in the coat of his son. Having made up our minds to this result we examined the Excise Inspector as to his knowledge of this household. Bishun has been acquitted of the particular offence charged against him arising out of these facts. But there is reason to believe from what we have heard in this case and from what the Inspector has added, that he is really the moving spirit of the concern and that this man, Banarsi although we are satisfied that he is implicated in it, probably only takes a subordinate part and lives with his family on the proceeds. But he has chosen, if in fact he is not the person principally responsible, to come into the witness box on oath in this case and to give evidence directed to establish the innocence of Bishun, one result of which, if true, was to increase the evidence against himself. It is impossible for us to decide whether his conduct was due to a desire to earn credit with Bishun and the other members of the family and to make himself a scapegoat for a person whom he knew to be guilty, or whether in fact what he said was literaly true. In the ordinary way one would be disposed to take a more lenient view of the conduct of a man who, in aiding and abetting the principal offender in a subordinate capacity has been caught, while the principal offender has escaped. But it is impossible to do so in this case as this man, we are satisfied, coldly and deliberately put himself forward for the express purpose of shielding the man who is probably the principal offender, and the sooner people understand that they will not by that course escape the just punishment of their own admissions, the better for them. Everybody knows that they are not really the principals but if they choose to take upon themselves that character, they will be dealt with, and ought to be dealt and punished as such, by the courts which have to deal with their cases. The only punishment which seems in these cases to have a deterrent effect is, as the Inspector tells us, a punishment of imprisonment, and if Banarsi has brought upon himself the punishment which is merited by somebody else, he has only himself to thank. We sentence Banarsi to six months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 500. In default of payment of fine he will serve another six months' rigorous imprisonment. He must surrender to his bail.

Appeal allowed, aquittal set aside.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.:—The dispute in this appeal relates to the property of Sardar Khan, who died on the 24th of Septemper, 1907, leaving two daughters, Mt. Mubarak-un-nissa and Mt. Bismilla Begam, who are the plaintiffs, and three grandsons Mahammad Raza Khan, Maqsud Khan and Daud Khan by a predeceased son, who are the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3. He also left a brother Mahmud Khan and a nephew, Nazar Muhammad Khan, who was the son of one of his predeceased brothers. Mahmud Khan had two sons, Usman Khan and Chhidda Khan. The plaintiff Mt. Bismilla Begam was married to Usman Khan, who died in the lifetime of Mahmud Khan.

On the death of Sardar Khan his property was entered in the names of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3. The plaintiffs took no steps to get their names entered in the revenue papers in regard to the share of the property, now claimed by them. Their case was that the property in dispute devolved on the death of Sardar Khan on the plaintiffs to the extent of a two-thirds share and on Mahmud Khan to the extent of the remaining one-third: that Mahmud Khan told them that he had got their names entered in the revenue papers is respect of their two-thirds share, and that they had been in receipt of the profits of their share from Mahmud Khan till 1324 Fasli. Their complaint was that the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 had wrongfully made certain mortgages of the property in question in favour of the other defendants and that it was not until some of the latter defendants had obtained a decree for the sale of the properties mortgaged with them that they came to know that their names were not entered in the revenue papers. The present suit was accordingly filed by them for the recovery of possession of the two-thirds share of the properties in the villages of Patwari, Nagli Bilooh and Basantpur, and for mesne profits. A declaration was also claimed that the mortgages effected by the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 in favour of the other defendants were not valid and binding on them.

The suit was principally contested by Narain Das and his sons, and Chhadammi Lal. Their defence was that the plaintiffs had never been in possession of any portion of the property in dispute and that the claim was barred by limitation and by section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act and section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. It was further pleaded by some of the contesting defendants that the plaintiffs had relinquished their claim to a share in the property of their father and at the time when mutation of names was effected in favour of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

It was admitted that Ibrahim Khan, the father of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3, had died in the lifetime of Sardar Khan. The Court below found that the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 were in possession of the property in dispute as trespassers; that the plaintiffs had never been in receipt of the profits of the property in question and that the claim was barred by limitation. It further found that the plaintiffs had relinquished their claim to a share in the property of their father and that the mortgagees had acted, after reasonable care and enquiry, in taking the mortgages now impeached, from the ostensible owners, whose names were entered in the revenue papers, for consideration, and in good faith.

The first question for consideration in this appeal is whether the claim of the plaintiffs was barred by limitation. The lower appellate Court was apparently led to think, by what was stated in the plaint and which does not appear to have been contested by the other side, that the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 were not entitled to any share in the property of their grandfather Sardar Khan; but that is not however so. Under the Muhammedan law, on the death of Sardar Khan, the property devolved on the two plaintiffs to the extent of a two-thirds share, and the remaining one-third share devolved on the defendants 1, 2 and 3 as residuaries of the first class. The defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 cannot therefore be regarded as trespassers; and on the principle laid down in Corea v. Appuhamy (1) no claim to adverse title can be set up by these defendants because among co-sharers the possession of one co-sharer cannot become adverse to another except where the co-sharer in possession has explicitly denied and repudiated the title of the others and has been in possession since then for more than 12 years. The plaintiffs produced evidence to show that they had been in receipt of the profits up to 1324 Fasli but that evidence is of little value. One of the plaintiffs was living in a village in the Meerut district; the other plaintiff was living in the house of Chhidda Khan, the brother of her deceased husband. The defendants 1, 2 and 3 had applied for the mutation of their names on the 22nd November, 1907, and they got an order for mutation in their favour without any objection some time in February, 1908. After the death of Sardar Khan, Mahmud Khan was appointed lambardar of the villages in question, and there is no reliable evidence to show that any profits were paid by Mahmud Khan to any of the plaintiffs. After the death of Mahmud Khan, Nazar Muhammad Khan was appointed lambardar of the village but Nazar Muhammad Khan has not been produced; and we see no reason for differing from the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge on this matter. The finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that the possession of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 was adverse from its inception is, however, vitiated by the fact that according to his view the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 were trespassers, whereas they were really co-sharers; and as co-sharers there is nothing to show that they had ever set up an express ouster against their aunts or that they had set up an adverse title within their knowledge. The claim of the plaintiffs as against these defendants cannot therefore be deemed to be barred by limitation or by adverse possession within the meaning of article 144 of the Indian Limitation Act.

The next question for consideration is whether the plaintiffs had ever surrendered their claim to a share in the property of their father. The only evidence produced on the point is that of Ahmad Baksh who states that some time before his death Sardar Khan had stated that his property should be entered in the names of his sons after his death. In the application made for the mutation of names after the death of Sardar Khan by the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 no such oral devise was referred to. The claim was then based on inheritance and we do not consider that the evidence of Ahmad Baksh on that point can be accepted as reliable. The learned Subordinate Judge refers to the conduct of Mahmud Khan in not setting up a claim to what was supposed to be his share in the property of his brother; but as we have already pointed out that reasoning proceeds on a misapprehension of the manner in which the property devolved on the death of Sardar Khan. Mahmud Khan was not entitled to any share in the property of Sardar Khan in the presence of the plaintiffs and the defendants 1, 2 and 3; and his conduct in not applying for the entry of his name is explicable and cannot affect the title of the plaintiffs to a share in the property of their father.

The learned Subordinate Judge, however, proceeded to base his decision against the plaintiffs on a third ground which was stronger, namely, that the claim was barred by section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. It appears from the description of the mortgaged property given in the deeds of mortgage produced by the mortgagees that the property in dispute had been partitioned apparently some time after the death of Sardar Khan between the different co-sharers of the villages in question and that the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 along with some of the other co-sharers had made mortgages for consideration in favour of Narain Das and his son Kishori Lal and some of the other defendants between 1911 and 1917. All these deeds of mortgage give a detailed description of the mortgaged property with the mahals to which they appertained at the time of the mortgage; and we have no doubt that copies or extracts from the khewats must have been available at the time these mortgage-deeds were written in order to supply the parties to the transaction with an accurate description of the entries that existed at that time in the revenue papers in regard to them. These entries must naturally have satisfied the mortgagees that the mortgagors had a good title to the properties, which they were mortgaging; and we have no doubt that acting on these entries the mortgagees advanced the considerations mentioned in the deeds of mortgage. As observed by Lindley, L.J., in Bailey v. Barnes (2)

(2) (1894) 1 Ch. Div. 25.

"A purchaser of property is under no legal obligation to investigate his vendor's title. But in dealing with real property, as in other matters of business, regard is had to the usual course of business ; and a purchaser who wilfully departs from it in order to avoid acquiring a knowledge of his vendor's title is not allowed to derive any advantage from his wilful ignorance of defects, which would have come to his knowledge, if he had transacted his business in the ordinary way."

There was nothing in the course of dealings connected with the property in dispute, which would have required on the part of the mortgagee's who lived in other places greater circumspection than appears to have been exercised in the present instance by an examination of the entries in the revenue papers. These entries would in the ordinary course have been sufficient to satisfy a mortgagee of the title of the mortgagor to mortgage the properties in question; and we do not consider that there were any circumstances rendering a further enquiry on his part necessary. Section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act lays down that "where, with the consent, express or implied, of the persons interested in the immoveable property, a person is the ostensible owner of such property and transfers the same for consideration, the transfer shall not be voidable on the ground that the transferor was not authorised to make it: provided the transferee, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, has acted in good faith."

The plaintiffs had, by their conduct or omission, allowed the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to get their names entered in the revenue papers to their exclusion. These entries existed from as far back as 1908 and remained unchallenged till the present suit was filed. The mortgagees advanced money on the strength of these entries to the persons whose names were entered in the revenue papers as the owners of these properties. They acted in good faith. There was no circumstance established which rendered it necessary for them to take greater care than what appears to have been taken in the present instance and we consider that the mortgagees are sufficiently protected in what they did by the above provisions.

On behalf of the plaintiffs reliance has been placed on the decision in Partab Chand v. Saiyida Bibi (3), and Azima Bibi v. Shamalanand (4), but the circumstances of each case would naturally vary and the conclusion based on facts found in one case cannot be of any assistance in the determination of a similar issue on the facts found in another case. In the former case it was found that the transferee could have ascertained that the property which the transferors professed to transfer was acquired in their names by their father, who was a Tahsildar, when they were children of tender years, and that there were other circumstances which rendered it incumbent on the transferee not to rest satisfied with merely seeing that the names of the transferors were entered in the revenue records. In the latter case the transferee was a pleader from whom greater circumspection would naturally have been expected; and the main ground on which the transferee sought protection was that he thought that the transferor who would ordinarily have been governed by the Muhammedan law had still retained the Hindu law in the matter of inheritance. The plea set up on behalf of the transferee was of such an unusual nature that their Lordships of the Privy Council felt constrained to think that he had not discharged the onus which lay upon him of making due enquiry in regard to the manner in which the property had descended before taking the mortgage. A reference has also been made to the decision in Muhammad Sulaiman v. Mt. Sakina Bibi (5) but in that case it was found that the transferee, though aware of the title of the original owner before he had taken the transfer, had omitted to make further enquiry as to how that title had passed from the original owner to the transferor. No such special circumstances exist in the present case. On the other hand, the circumstances of the present case are somewhat similar to those in Khwaja Muhammad Khan v. Muhammad Ibrahim (6) and we are satisfied that there was nothing in the transaction to require the mortgagees to make a further enquiry as to the real title to the property beyond what appeared from the entries in the revenue papers.

The claim of the plaintiffs is, therefore, barred as against the transferees in regard to the property mortgaged with them. Their claim as against the defendants 1, 2 and 3 must, however, succeed. We allow the appeal accordingly and decree the claim of the plaintiffs against the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 with costs here and hitherto; but dismiss it as against the remaining defendants who will get their costs here and hitherto from the plaintiffs-appellants. The costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Among the papers printed by the defendants-respondents there are several papers which do not relate to the properties in dispute. There are others which were equally unnecessary to be printed for the purposes of this appeal. In fact, no reference has been made to most of these papers. We direct accordingly that the costs incurred in the translation and printing of the tabular matter exhibited from pages 116 to 181 of the printed record shall be excluded from the defendants' costs.

Appeal partly allowed.

F. A. No. 330 of 1921, decided on 19th December, 1923, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Bijnor, dated 26th May, 1921.

• Juisdiction—Plaintiff's valuation determines jurisdiction; at least where defendant does not object Court can't be said to be acting without jurisdiction.

It is perfectly clear on all hands that when a suit is filed in a Civil Court the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court is primarily determined by the valuation which the plaintiff puts upon the subject matter of the suit. It is open to a defendant when he appears to answer the suit to raise the plea that the suit has not been properly valued and to show if he can that the Court in which the suit has been brought has no jurisdiction to try it. But clearly if no such plea is taken by a defendant when he has had the opportunity of raising it it cannot be said that the Court has acted without jurisdiction. [P. 389, C. 2.]

S. Raza Ali—for Appellants.

S. A. Haider—for Respondents.

Lindsay, J.:—After hearing the learned Counsel for the appellants in this case we are clearly of opinion that the appeal must fail.

The relevant facts to be stated are as follows:—

In the year 1882 one Muhammad Rahmat Ali executed an agreement whereby he undertook to pay to his daughter-in-law Mt. Amina Khatun a sum of Rs. 15 a month for food and clothing. This payment was to be made to her during her life-time.

In order to secure the performance of this undertaking Saiyid Rahmat Ali hypothecated a 5 biswas Muafi share in the village named Phondapore and charged this property with the allowance which he had contracted to give his daughter-in-law. It was distinctly provided by this agreement that if Rahmat Ali failed to pay the said monthly allowance of Rs. 15 any month, the lady was to be entitled to take possession of the property which was charged and to realise the income thereof under her own supervision and to spend the same for her food and clothing.

Pausing here, it is clear beyond all doubt that the lady if she took possession was to be entitled to bring to her use the entire income of the property upon which her allowance had been charged during her life-time.

It is apparent from the judgment in this case that Amina Khatun has had on more than one occasion to bring suits to enforce this agreement.

Rahmat Ali himself has died but he has left daughters, Mt. Khudaijatul Kubra and Mt. Atiqatul Kubra, who are the plaintiffs in the present suit.

The other issue of Rahmat Ali is Saiyid Saqib Husain who is married to Mt. Amina Khatun.

In the year 1920 Mt. Amina Khatun brought a suit against the present two plaintiffs, Mt. Khudaijatul Kubra and Mt. Atiqatul Kubra, for possession of a $2\frac{1}{2}$ biswas share of the property in mauza Phondapur.

It appears that these ladies were in possession of this $2\frac{1}{2}$ biswas share, that being one-half of the 5 biswas share upon which Rahmat Ali had created the charge in favour of his daughter-in-law Mt. Amina Khatun.

Full particulars of this case are not before us. All we have on record is the judgment of the Munsif. There are also one or two copies of certain statements which were made in the course of this case.

According to the finding of the Court below the lady, Amina Khatun, alleged apparently that a sum of Rs. 54 odd was owing to her on account of arrears of the allowance to which she was entitled and she asked to be allowed to enforce the agreement by taking possession of the property charged with her maintenance including the 2½ biswas of this property which were in the possession of the present plaintiffs at the time.

According to what is stated in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, this suit was decreed ex parte, but after due service upon Khudaijatul Kubra and Atiqotul Kubra.

In execution of that decree possession over this property has passed to Mt. Amina Khatun.

It is important to observe that neither of the defendants in that suit has ever made any attempt to challenge the decree in appeal.

Instead of doing this they have launched the suit out of which this present appeal has arisen with all sorts of allegations directed against Mt. Amina Khatun with respect to the conduct of the earlier suit in the Munsif's Court. It is said that the suit was brought collusively and fraudulently, and it is also sought to be made out that the decree of the Munsif under which possession passed to Amina Khatun is altogether void for want of jurisdiction.

With regard to this plea of want of jurisdiction the case which was put for the plaintiff was this, namely, that the value of this 2½ biswas share which has passed into possession of Amina in execution of decree is Rs. 7,000. It is pointed out that this being the value of the property in suit in the case which was tried by the Munsif, the Munsif had no jurisdiction to give a decree for possession inasmuch as his pecuniary jurisdiction is limited to suits of a value not exceeding Rs. 1,000 or at most Rs. 2,000, if he has been specially invested with higher powers.

The question really is whether these plaintiffs are entitled to maintain a suit on this allegation. We are clearly of opinion that no suit of this kind can be maintained to set aside the Munsiff's decree on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

It is perfectly clear on all hands that when a suit is filed in a Civil Court the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court is primarily determined by the valuation which the plaintiff puts upon the subject-matter of the suit.

It may be, that sometimes the value of the suit is exaggerated and sometimes it is under-estimated, but at any rate, when a suit is brought and the Court has to make up its mind as to whether it is within its pecuniary jurisdiction, all that it can rely on is the valuation of the subject-matter which is given in the plaint.

Of course, it is open to a defendant when he appears to answer the suit, to raise the plea that the suit has not been properly valued and to show, if he can, that the Court in which the suit has been brought has no jurisdiction to try it. But clearly, if no such plea is taken by a defendant when he has had the opportunity of raising it, it cannot be said that the Court has acted without jurisdiction. The Court has assumed jurisdiction on the basis of a statement made in the plaint upon which it is bound to rely, a statement which has not been challenged or corrected in any way; and so it is not possible to argue as has been argued here that the decree passed by the Munsif in this case was altogether void for want of jurisdiction in the Munsif.

In this connection we may draw attention to the provisions of section 11 of the Suits Valuation Act, Act VII of 1887. That section lays down that unless an objection to the over-valuation or under-valuation of a suit has been raised in the Court of first instance it shall not be entertained by an appellate Court unless, for reasons to be recorded in writing, the appellate Court is satisfied that the suit in appeal was wrongly valued and that the wrong valuation has prejudicially affected the disposal of the suit on its merits. This enactment operates in spite of anything contained in section 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure which corresponds to section 99 of the present Code. It is clearly contemplated there that any objection which is to be raised on the ground of pecuniary jurisdiction must be taken in the trial Court at the earliest possible opportunity and where the objection is not taken it is not to be entertainable thereafter unless the appellate Court is satisfied that there has been some miscarriage of justice on the merits.

If this is the law in so far as it concerns procedure in appeals, it seems to us that in no way ought it to be possible for a party against whom a decree has been passed in the circumstances we find in this case, to be able to go to another Court and institute a fresh suit for the purpose of having the decree set aside. If this sort of things were allowed there would be no end to litigation. It is perfectly well understood of course, that the decree of a Court may be set aside by a suit brought, but it is also the rule that no such decree can be set aside except on the basis of fraud or of something akin to fraud. In the present case, although there were allegations of fraud made in the plaint, no case of fraud whatever has been made out and for this reason therefore we hold that this suit to set aside the decree which was passed by the Munsif on the 7th of May, 1920, is not maintainable. This finding of ours really puts an end to the whole of the case. It has been suggested to us that we ought, in any case, to allow an account to be taken between the plaintiffs and Mt. Amina Khatun on the ground that she is entitled under the agreement only to a sum of Rs. 15 a month, whereas, the present profits accruing from the property upon which this allowance is charged, are greatly in excess of that sum. We think it inexpedient to say anything about this claim except that the suit as framed was not a suit for accounts.

Another suggestion has been made to us that, in any case, under the terms of an award which is printed at pages 22 and 23 of the record, we ought to pass a money decree against Saiyid Saqib Husain the second defendant who is the husband of Mt. Amina Khatun. It is not clear to us however what decree for money could be passed against Saqib Husain and again we have to draw notice to the fact that no such relief was claimed in the plaint.

We are satisfied therefore that this suit was a suit which ought not to have been entertained and which though for other reasons, was rightly dismissed by the Court below. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Samar Bahadur Singh and another— Defendants-Appellants

v.

Jit Lal and another— Plaintiffs-Respondents.

S. A. No. 385 of 1922, decided on 7th February, 1924, from a decree of Small Cause Judge, Allahabad.

* (a) Transfer of Property Act, S. 120—Exchange is not market value of the property given by either but the inherent value and the convenience of either party.

The value of the property and the convenience which one person secures is the price that he receives for the property exchanged. Intrinsic value of the property as distinguished from the market value varies according to the purpose or the necessity which induces the exchange. An exchange implies an interchange of property with another and except in so far as the price is not payable in money the rights and obligations attaching to an exchange are analogous to a sale. But those rights and obligations are enforceable between the parties inter se. Thus third parties cannot be substituted in place of either. [P. 391, C. 2.]

(b) Pre-emption—Exchange.

Exchange is not sale and consequently where sale alone gives the right of pre-emption there is no such right in case of exchange.

K. N. Katju—for Appellants.

S. N. Sen, Iqbal Ahmad and S. P. Sinha—for Respondents.

Judgment:—The question for consideration in this case is whether a right of pre-emption can be claimed in respect of an exchange. By an agreement dated the 21st October, 1919, some land situated in the village Ramnagar urf Gansiari was given by Ahmad Zaman Khan in exchange for other land situated in the village Balika Jalalpur given by Samar Bahadur Singh and Jaduraj Singh. The object of the latter in taking the former property in exchange was to construct a road running from their village through the former village. The plaintiffs claim to be co-sharers of the village Ramnagar Gansiari and seek to pre-empt the land given by Ahmad Zaman Khan for the construction of the road. The wajib-ul-arz of that village provides that any co-sharer, wishing to sell or mortgage the whole or part of his property shall, on the receipt of the price offered by a stranger, transfer it first to co-sharers who are descended with him from a common stock and are closely related, then to the other co-sharers of the village, and on their refusal to a stranger.

The Courts below, relying on the decision in Niamat Ali v. Asmat Bibi (1) and Bhagwan Singh v. Kaharag Singh (2), came to the conclusion that the custom recorded in the wajib-ul-arz was applicable to an exchange; and they granted a decree for pre-emption subject to the payment of the value of the property mentioned in the deed of exchange.

> An exchange implies an interchange of property with another, and except in so far as the price may not be payable in money, the rights and obligations, attaching to an exchange, are analogous to those of a sale. Section 120 of the Transfer of Property Act lays down that save as provided in Chapter VI of that Act, each party to an exchange has the rights and is subject to the liabilities of a seller as to that which he gives, and has the rights and is subject to the liabilities of the buyer as to that which he takes. But those rights and liabilities, are enforceable between the parties to the exchange inter se. Third persons cannot be substituted in the place of either of them, because they cannot give what does not belong to them. The intrinsic value of the property given in exchange, as distinguished from its market value, would, moreover, vary according to the purpose or necessity for which the exchange was effected. The custom recorded in the wajib-ul-arz is in terms confined to a sale or mortgage; and in either of those cases a money equivalent would be an adequate compensation to the party concerned. The price, which a person receives for the property exchanged, is represented by the value of the property he gives and the convenience which he secures for himself. The latter cannot always be valued in money.

Indeed, as pointed out in Bhagwan Singh v. Rajwanta Kunwar (3) the question for consideration in such a case is whether the incidents of the particular custom set up cover an exchange. The plaintiff in each case must prove not merely that some custom prevails but he must prove a custom under which he is entitled to claim pre-emption. The language used in the wajib-ul-arz in the above case was closely approximate to the language used here.

(1) (1885) 7 All. 626 (F.B.).
(2) (1907) 4 A.L.J. 756.
(3) (1917) 38 I.C. 157.

In Niamat Ali v. Asmat Bibi (1) the language used was much more general. The right of pre-emption was there allowed in the case of a transfer of any kind, whereas in the present case the right is allowed only in the case of a transfer by sale or mortgage.

In Bhangwan Singh v. Kaharag Singh (2) the language used was not so general; but the decision in that case must be deemed to be qualified by the latter decision in Bhagwan Singh v. Rajwanta Kunwar (3).

A reference has also been made to the decision in Daryao Singh v. Jhan Singh (4); but the language used in the wajib-ul-arz in that case was similarly more general, and the decision arrived at on the construction of the wajib-ul-arz there relied upon cannot therefore apply to the facts established in the present appeal. This appeal must therefore be allowed and the claim of the plaintiffs dismissed with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

S.A. No. 633 of 1922, decided on 5th December, 1923, from the decree of District Judge, Pilibhit, dated 28th February, 1922.

Restitution of conjugal rights—Cruelty.

Where an order for maintenance had to be executed by imprisonment of the husband who had alleged wife's unchastity, Held there is reasonable apprehension of bodily injury if she returns to her husband.

S. N. Sen—for Appellant.

Respondent was not represented.

Stuart, J.:—This is an appeal by a husband whose suit for restitution of conjugal rights has been dismissed by the lower appellate Court. The learned District Judge not having decided certain points, we propose to decide them ourselves under the provisions of section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure. These are the facts as we find them. The appellant is a Brahman. Many years ago he turned his wife out of doors stating that he suspected her chastity. The woman went to live with her uncle who supported her. She then applied to the Criminal Court for a maintenance order under section 488 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and she obtained an order awarding her sufficient maintenance. It is to be noted that under the law she could not have received maintenance if without sufficient reason she refused to live with her husband or if they were living separately by mutual consent. The plaintiff has admitted that when the maintenance proceedings were in progress before the Magistrate he even then refused to take his wife back stating that at the time he suspected her chastity. When the woman endeavoured to obtain the money that was due to her the husband refused to pay it and she had to attach his property and to arrest him and place him in custody to execute the order. At the end of this he has applied for restitution of conjugal rights against her and has advanced the somewhat amazing suggestion that although he has suspected her chastity for 20 years, now that she has claimed an order of maintenance against him, his suspicion has been allayed. It is perfectly clear why he has brought this suit. If he succeeds he will be able to go to the Criminal Court and say that his wife is refusing to live with him without sufficient reason and the order of maintenance will then be cancelled. But what will become of the woman? She will be deprived of maintenance and will then be compelled to return and live with her husband sooner or later. In the circumstances we have no hesitation in saying that she will have a reasonable apprehension of bodily injury if she returns to her husband. We consider that the suit was rightly dismissed and dismiss this appeal. The appellant will pay his own costs. The other side being unrepresented will pay her own costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Behari Lal—Appellant

v.

James Maclean and others—Respondents.

S. A. No. 726 of 1922, decided on 4th January, 1924, from the decree of District Judge, Farrukhabad, dated 10th February, 1922.

Nuisance—Discomfort must be substantial and must be to any person irrespective of age, health or status.

A discomfort to be actionable should be substantial. It should be substantial not merely with reference to the plaintiff it must be of such a degree that it would be substantial to any person occupying the premises of the plaintiff, irrespective of his position in life, age or state of health. There is a distinction between an action for a nuisance in respect of an act producing a material injury to property and one brought in respect of an act producing personal discomfort. As to the latter a person must in the interest of the public generally submit to the discomfort of the circumstances of the place and the trades carried on around him. The nature of the interference has to be examined in each case in the light of the circumstances of the place where the thing complained of actually occurs and the degree of inconvenience caused must determine the nature of the relief to which the person complaining may be entitled. But where an occupation is carried on by one person in the neighbourhood of another, and the result of that trade or occupation or business is a material or substantial interference with the ordinary physical comfort and convenience of another person residing in that locality then very different considerations unquestionably arise. [P. 393, Cs. 1 and 2.]

K. N. Katju—for Appellant.

Gulzari Lal—for Respondent.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.:—The plaintiff, Imamuddin, owns a house situated in bazar Katra Ahmadganj in Farrukhabad City. The house is occupied by the other plaintiffs, one of whom is a clergyman and the other who is his wife, practises as a lady doctor. Behind this house is situated a house belonging to the defendant, where a flour mill worked by an oil engine has been recently started. The allegation of the plaintiff was that the working of the flour mill caused great trouble to the occupants of the house and interfered with their business and ordinary physical comfort. The defendant stated that he had been working the flour mill in another house situated at a distance of about 20 to 25 paces from that place for nine years, that that house was recently purchased by Mathura Prasad who started a steam engine of his own in that locality, and that he had consequently to shift from that place to the present house.

Both the Courts below inspected the locality and came to the conclusion that the working of the flour mill in that locality undoubtedly interfered with the comfort of the occupants of the house and disturbed them in carrying on their usual business. The Court of first instance referred to the evidence of one of the plaintiffs and stated that the soot arising from the chimney of the oil engine would spread into the house of the plaintiffs and fall upon the articles kept there, that there would be bad smell produced from the kerosine oil used in the engine, and that the noise resulting from the close proximity of the house of the plaintiffs to the place where the engine was worked would cause substantial inconvenience to the tenants occupying the same and more so to the lady doctor who had to use a Stethoscope to examine the hearts and the lungs of the patients coming to her for treatment. The lower appellate Court made no attempt to discuss the evidence at all. The view taken by it was that the smell of the smoke from the engine caused little discomfort but the noise and regular throb of the engine so close to the house of the plaintiffs was "a distinct and pervading nuisance" to the occupants of the house, whose nerves would naturally be disturbed till in course of time they got accustomed to the same.

What may, however, cause inconvenience to persons with dainty or elegant modes or habits of living may not cause similar inconvenience to persons accustomed to live in the busiest portion of a town. A discomfort to be actionable should be substantial. It should be substantial not merely with reference to the plaintiff; it must be of such a degree that it would be substantial to any person, occupying the premises of the plaintiff, irrespective of his position in life, age, or state of health. As pointed out by Lord Westbury in St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping (1), there is a distinction between an action for a nuisance in respect of an act producing a material injury to property, and one brought in respect of an act producing personal discomfort. As to the latter a person must, in the interest of the public generally, submit to the discomfort of the circumstances of the place, and the trades carried on around him. The nature of the interference has to be examined in each case in the light of the circumstances of the place, where the thing complained of actually occurs, and the degree of inconvenience caused must determine the nature of the relief to which the person complaining may be entitled. "If a man lives in a town," said Lord Westbury, it is necessary that he should subject himself to the consequences of those operations of trade which may be carried on in his immediate locality, which are actually necessary for trade and commerce, and also for the enjoyment of property and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town and of the public at large. If a man lives in a street where there are numerous shops and a shop is opened next door to him, which is carried on in a fair and reasonable way, he has no ground for complaint, because to himself individually there may arise much discomfort from the trade carried on in that shop". But where an occupation is carried on by one person in the neighbourhood of another, and the result of that trade or occupation or business is a material or substantial interference with the ordinary physical comfort and convenience of another person, residing in that locality, then very different considerations unquestionably arise.

No attempt was made by the Court below to determine how long this oil engine had been at work, if not in this house, at least in the locality close to this building. The lower appellate Court does not say that the disturbance would be so substantial as to render the house practically uninhabitable for ordinary people without serious discomfort. It is in evidence that Mathura Prasad has a flour mill worked by a gas engine at about 20 to 25 paces from this locality. It is also in evidence that the present Chairman of the Municipal Board has in his own compound at Fatehgarh close to a public hospital, where patients have to be examined from time to time by the medical attendants, a flour mill in working order, to which no objection has ever been taken on the score of discomfort or otherwise by the residents of the locality. There is also evidence to show that an attempt was made to move the Municipal Board under section 245 of the U. P. Municipalities Act (I of 1916) to remove the oil engines working within Municipal limits or to stop the starting of factories worked by oil engines there and that the Municipal Board refused to take any action in the matter. Several residents of the locality, where the flour mill engine is at work, were produced on behalf of the defendant to show that no discomfort was suffered by the neighbours or residents of that locality. A sub-assistant surgeon was, moreover, examined who stated that he had seen the flour mill engine actually at work and that the noise produced by the oil engine was of an ordinary character and that no injury to the health of the residents of the locality was likely to result from the working of that engine at that place. We are prepared to give due weight to the observations made by the Courts below on an examination of the locality and have no doubt that the noise produced by the engine must be a source of some inconvenience to the persons residing there. But a flour mill worked by a gas engine is already in existence in that locality and from the fact that such flour mills exist in other parts of the town we are not prepared to say that any reasonable case for the removal of the flour mill or oil engine has been made out.

Whether anything is a nuisance or not is a question to be determined not merely by an abstract consideration of the thing itself but with reference to its circumstances; and where a locality is used for the purpose of carrying on a trade or manufacture, the fact that such trade or manufacture does exist elsewhere, not far from the place, cannot be left out of account. As pointed out by Clerk and Lindsell, the affairs of life in a dense neighbourhood cannot be carried on without mutual sacrifice of comfort and in all actions for discomfort the law must regard the principle of mutual adjustment, and the notion that the degree of discomfort, which might sustain an action under some circumstances, must therefore do so under all circumstances is as untenable as the notion that if the act complained of was done in a convenient time and place, it must, therefore, be justified, whatever was the degree of annoyance that was occasioned thereby, (Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, 6th edition, p. 419.)

It is not seriously suggested that the house of the plaintiffs will become wholly untenable by reason of the construction of the flour mill or the use of the oil engine; and we do not consider that any substantial interference with the physical comfort and convenience of the residents of the house has been made out. In these circumstances we allow the appeal and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with costs here and hitherto.

Appeal allowed.

* Easements Act, Ss. 33 and 35—No damage is substantial unless value is materially diminished and physical comforts or business are materially interfered with.

Each case of disturbance of light and air must be decided on its own facts. Under Ss. 33 and 35 no damage is substantial unless it materially diminishes the value of the dominant heritage and interferes materially with the physical comfort of the plaintiff or prevents him from carrying on his accustomed business in the dominant heritage as beneficially as he might have done prior to the disturbance. [P. 395, Cs. 1 and 2.]

* Easements Act, S. 28—Scope.

Extent of an easement other than an easement of necessity as also the mode of its enjoyment must be fixed with reference to the purpose for which the right was acquired.

K. N. Katju and H. K. Kaul—for Appellant.

G. W. Dillon—for Respondent.

Kanhaiya Lal, J.:—The question for consideration in this case is whether the defendant was entitled to construct his wall in such a manner as to block a window in the verandah of the plaintiff which opened towards the land of the defendant. The window had been in existence for more than twenty years. The Court of first instance refused to direct the demolition of the wall by which the window was blocked, holding that the construction had not had the effect of materially interfering with the access of light and air to the verandah of the plaintiff. The lower appellate Court, however, thought that as the effect of the construction of the wall was to block the window entirely, the plaintiff was entitled to have the obstruction removed in order that the access of light and air through the window might remain unaffected. In doing so it disregarded the conditions of the locality, inasmuch as the verandah of the plaintiff had sufficient access of light and air from the other sides and the blocking up of the window had made no difference whatsoever to the light and air which was obtainable to the verandah of the plaintiff otherwise.

Section 28 of the Indian Easements Act lays down that the extent of an easement other than an easement of necessity, and the mode of its enjoyment must be fixed with reference to the purpose for which the right was acquired. The verandah in question has got a street in front, from which any amount of light and air can be obtained. It has got three or four doors behind and a window on the north, which would help the passage of air from one end of the verandah to another. The window in dispute was on the south and its obstruction cannot possibly involve a material interference with the access of light and air, so as to entitle the plaintiff to claim that it should be restored to its original condition.

The lower appellate Court refers to the decision in Khunni Lal v. Kundan Bibi (1) but it is possible that the circumstances of that case may have justified an order for the removal of the obstruction. Section 35 of the Indian Easements Act lays down that subject to the provisions of the Specific Relief Act of 1877, an injunction may be granted to restrain the disturbance of an easement, if an easement is actually disturbed, when compensation for such disturbance might be recovered; and section 33 of the same Act declares that the owner or occupier of a dominant heritage can institute a suit for compensation for the disturbance of the easement where the disturbance has actually caused a substantial damage to the plaintiff. Where the easement disturbed is a right to the free passage of light, passing to the openings in a house, no damage is considered substantial within the meaning of sections 33 and 35, unless it materially diminishes the value of the dominant heritage and interferes materially with the physical comfort of the plaintiff or prevents him from carrying on his accustomed business in the dominant heritage as beneficially as he might have done previous to the disturbance.

In Paul v. Robson (2) their Lordships of the Privy Council, referring to the case of Colls v. The Home Colonial Stores (3) pointed out that the legal test in such an action was whether the obstruction complained of was a nuisance or whether the owner of the dominant tenement was getting the uninterrupted access through his ancient windows of a quantity of light, the measure of which was what was required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business of the tenement according to the ordinary notions of mankind.

In Gajadhar v. Keshav Lal (4) it was similarly held that the owner of a dominant tenement was not entitled to an injunction except in such cases where he would be entitled to recover damages, or in other words where the disturbance in equity caused substantial damages to the plaintiff of the kind referred to in the explanation appended to section 33 of the Indian Easements Act.

The plaintiff has therefore no absolute right to protect his window against obstruction. He has a right to the access of sufficient light and air through his window, but if there is already a sufficient access of light and air to his house through the other openings therein and the obstruction caused to the window does not materially or in any measure interefere with the sufficiency of the access of such light and air, the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief.

The lower appellate Court has omitted to find whether the obstruction of the window had the effect of materially interfering with the access of light and air to the verandah of the plaintiff or not, but the learned Munsif who inspected the locality points out that the verandah of the plaintiff is quite open in front, that is, on the western side, where there is an open space forming the ground of the Pokhrayan market, that there is another window on the northern side and that there are some doors on the eastern side opening into the sitting room of the plaintiff which bring in an abundant supply of light and air to the verandah. In fact, according to the map attached to the plaint there is a street in front of the verandah and the plaintiff does not really suffer any injury by the blocking up of the window. Each case of an alleged disturbance of an easement of light and air must be decided on its own facts. On the facts disclosed in the present case the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief, as he has suffered no real injury. The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the claim of the plaintiff for the demolition of the wall, blocking up the window in question, is dismissed with costs here and hitherto.

Appeal allowed.

MUKERJI, J.

Ram Sarup—Plaintiff-Appellant

v.

Hardeo and others—Defendants-Respondents.

S. A. No. 1358 of 1922, decided on 12th February, 1924, against the decree of District Judge, Bulanashahar, dated 7th September, 1922.

(a) Transfer of Property Act, S. 54—Contract of sale does not create interest in immoveable property—Contract.

A contract of sale of immoveable property does not create even an equitable interest in immoveable properties.

(b) Registration Act, S. 49—Absence of registration.

An unregistered compromise of an offence compounded with the permission of the Criminal Court by which some rooms belonging to the accused were treated as belonging to the complainant and were given in exchange for the rooms belonging to the accused, does not pass title to the complainant.

(c) Transfer of Property Act, S. 54—Vendee under an unregistered deed in possession cannot be ousted by vendor without paying the vendee the price thereof.

Where by an unregistered compromise of a criminal case two rooms belonging to the accused were given to the complainant, the accused can recover them back without on paying the price to the complainant as the title did not vest in the complainant, the property being worth more than Rs. 100; but only on paying the price can he do so.

Nihal Chand—for Appellant.

B. K. Mukerji—for Respondents.

Judgment:—The facts which have given rise to this second appeal are briefly these:—

There is an enclosure No. 43, in which there are, it seems, several rooms or houses. The appellant who was the plaintiff in the Court below, has been found to be the owner of the entire enclosure. Two of the rooms or buildings in this enclosure are the subject-matter of the suit. In a portion of this enclosure, the defendants and their predecessors were living. It has been found by the Court below that their possession was permissive. The parties, it appears, quarrelled and fought over the possession of the defendants and one of the parties on the side of the defendants sustained grievous hurt. There was a criminal case and a compromise was arrived at on the 5th of June, 1918. It was embodied on a paper bearing a stamp duty of eight annas and was not registered. It was stated in the compromise deed that room No. 126 was given up by the defendants and that they were given room No. 129 in lieu of the same. It was further stated and agreed that the defendants would continue in possession of room No. 128 'as before'. The finding is that on this compromise being entered into, the prosecution was dropped and evidently the permission of the Court was obtained to the compounding of the offence. For the compromise was filed in the Criminal Court. Just on the last day of the expiry of three years, the plaintiff filed this suit for recovery of possession of the rooms Nos. 128 and 129. He pleaded that the compromise had been obtained by the exercise of undue influence. But that point has been given up in appeal in this court. The only point that has been argued is this. The compromise was really a document by which the plaintiff transferred his title to the property in favour of the defendants. The value of the property has been found roughly, by the Court below, to be about Rs. 500. Such a transfer could only be effected by means of a registered document under the provisions of the Registration Act, section 17 and section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. The document being unregistered it really conveyed no title to the defendants and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to get back what was really his own property.

The Courts below dismissed the suit holding that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming the property back, although the title still remains with him.

I have to see whether this proposition of law is correct. It having been found that the property originally belonged absolutely to the plaintiff and it having been found that the possession of the defendants was only permissive there can be no doubt that the defendants are bound to leave the property when the plaintiff asks them to do so. If any document is pleaded in bar of such a suit that document must be registered under the law already quoted. Even if we take the transaction as one by which the plaintiff relinquished his title in favour of the defendants, the document would come under clause (b) of section 17 of the Registration Act and his title to it can be extinguished only by a registered document.

The document being unregistered is inadmissible in evidence under section 49 of the Registration Act. Indeed the defendants are precluded from saying that there is a document in their favour by which the title of the plaintiff has been extinguished. Further they are not permitted to prove the agreement by oral evidence because the agreement such as it was had been reduced into writing (section 92 of the Evidence Act). Such being the case there really remains nothing to prevent the plaintiff from recovering.

For the respondents reliance has been placed on the case of Salamat-ul-Zamini v. Masha Alla Khan (1), a decision by two learned Judges of this Court. In that case it appears that there was an exchange of property between two parties and that exchange had been acted upon. After some time one of the parties to the exchange wanted to go back over the transaction and sought the recovery of the property which he had given away. There was no registered document to record the transaction. It was held by Walsh, J., that the rules of equity would prevent the plaintiff from succeeding. Piggott, J., was of opinion that the title of the plaintiff was not lost but on equitable principles the Court would not give its aid in favour of the plaintiff. In my opinion that ruling has no bearing on the facts of this case. In the case before me, the defendants gave nothing to the plaintiff in the shape of any tangible property, according to the finding of the Court below. The property which they purported to exchange was the property of the plaintiff himself. The entire enclosure has been found to be the property of the plaintiff. All the consideration that the plaintiff got for purporting to give away his two rooms Nos. 128 and 129 was the dropping of the prosecution that was going on against him. This was no doubt a good consideration and would have created a valid consideration for a sale. But the question is, where there is no sale-deed, can the mere fact that a consideration passed operate to create a title. To put it in simple terms suppose a man agrees to sell for a sum of Rs. 500, his house. He receives the consideration and hands over the property. Can he not in the absence of a registered sale-deed go back over the contract and say here is the sum of Rs. 500 which you gave to me; take it and give me back my property. If he could not be allowed to say so, the result would be an extension of the law, as embodied in section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. It lays down that in the case of property of the value of Rs. 100 or more, a sale could be effected only by a registered instrument. In the case of property of lesser value a sale could be effected by delivery of possession. If we say that the mere fact that possession had been delivered and the sale price had been paid, was sufficient for the creation of a title or for preventing the plaintiff from getting back his own property, shall we not really be legislating? The Calcutta High Court in a case directly on the point, Jagadbandhu Shah v. Radh Krishna Pal (2) held that the rules of equity would not apply where there were clear provisions of law, to the contrary. In the case of Umrao Singh v. Lachhman Singh (3), there was a compromise in the nature of a family settlement. It had been partially acted upon as the son of one of the parties to the contract obtained arrears of maintenance on foot of it, but their Lordships of the Privy Council had no hesitation in holding that the compromise failed so far as immoveable property was concerned simply because the document had not been registered under Act XI of 1877, section 17. That, in India a mere contract does not create any equitable interest in immoveable property was held in the Privy Council case of Maung Shiva v. Maung Inn (4).

The title being with the plaintiff, as I have said, he must succeed. But he must also put the defendants in the same position in which they would have been in, if there had been no compromise. The compromise was to the effect that they would have a certain consideration for dropping the prosecution. If the consideration had been a certain sum of money there would have been no difficulty in putting the plaintiff to terms. He could have got his decree for possession on payment of the sum of money which was the consideration. In this case the prosecution was dropped in consideration of the two houses which have been found to have been the absolute property of the plaintiff. There was no clear issue before the lower Court as to the actual value of the houses. This point therefore

(1) (1923) 40 All. 487.

(2) (1914) 36 Cal. 920.
(3) (1911) 33 All. 344 (P.C.).
(4) (1917) 44 Cal. 542 (P.C.).

should now be decided. It is my opinion that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the houses only on payment of an equivalent in money of the same.

I remand the following issue for trial to the Court below :—

What is the value of the two houses Nos. 128 and 129 in enclosure No. 43?

Fresh evidence would be allowed on behalf of the parties. The finding would be returned in two months. Ten days' time is allowed for filing objections.

Case remanded.

PIGGOTT, J.

Dwarka Dhish Prosad Singh—Plaintiff-Applicant

v.

Raja Kesho Prosad Singh—Defendant-Opposite party.

O.S. No. 1 of 1923, decided on 18th December 1923.

 Civ. Pro. Code, O. 47, r. 1—Allegations of fraud in connection with petition of compromise accepted by a Court do not justify either review or revision under S. 151, Civ. Pro. Code—Civ. Pro Code, S. 151.*

A party filed a petition of compromise supported by an affidavit. On the day fixed for the appearance of the party himself his Counsel asked the Court to excuse the non-attendance of the party and stated that he had been instructed by the party personally to press the application for compromise. The Court accordingly passed a decree in terms of the compromise. Some time after the party applied for review of judgment on the ground that the petition of compromise and the affidavit were executed by the party because he was in fear of his life at the hands of the defendant. Held, that S. 151 could not be applied and O. 41, r. 1, also could not be applied.

N. P. Asthana—for Applicant.

Piggott, J.:—The application before me is one presented on the 8th of September, 1923, asking this Court to review an order of the 11th June, 1923, according to which it was held that a certain suit pending before the Court had been wholly adjusted by a lawful agreement and it was ordered that a decree should be passed in the terms contained in a certain paragraph of an affidavit purporting to be sworn by the plaintiff in connection with the aforesaid agreement. The application, as presented to the Court, did not refer to any provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure; but I have been informed in argument that it is intended to invoke either the inherent jurisdiction of this Court under section 151 of that Code, or the power of review given by Order 47, rule 1 of the same. When I set myself to specify the grounds upon which this application is made to me, I find it exceedingly difficult to compose any coherent summary of the 66 paragraphs of the affidavit which has been sworn in support of the application. The first 19 paragraphs are recitals of facts, some of which are apparent from the record before the Court and none of which have any bearing upon the question for determination, except in so far as they may be regarded as necessary to introduce or lead up to the allegations made in subsequent paragraphs. In the next four paragraphs it is merely asserted that the defendant, at a certain stage of the proceedings, communicated to the plaintiff a desire to enter into negotiations for a settlement of the suit. The six following paragraphs contain allegations, some of which are preferred in terms perhaps designedly vague, and certainly susceptible of more than one interpretation; but I can only understand these paragraphs as meaning that a certain petition of compromise and affidavit, which were presented to this Court on the 23rd of May, 1922, were executed by the plaintiff without knowledge of their contents, and because he was in fear of his life at the hands of the defendant. The story is continued in the next few paragraphs, but they do not seem to me to contain any matters directly bearing on the question now before me until I come to the 42nd paragraph of the affidavit. It is now necessary to explain exactly what did take place in this Court. A petition of compromise, supported by affidavit, was presented to me on the 23rd of May, 1923. I took up the matter in the presence of Counsel for both parties on the 25th of May. The important part of my order was that the application should be put up for disposal on the 11th June, 1923, and that the plaintiff should then attend in person. On the 11th June the plaintiff did not attend in person, but was represented by Mr. Sultan Ahmed, Advocate of the Patna High Court, a gentleman of the highest position in his profession, who was appearing in this Court by permission of the Hon'ble the Chief Justice. The record of the proceedings which followed shows that I was fully alive to the difficulties of the situation created by the failure of the plaintiff to comply with the order directing his personal attendance. I was assured by Mr. Sultan Ahmed that the order requiring the personal attendance of the plaintiff had reached the said plaintiff and that he, as Counsel for the plaintiff, had been instructed by the latter to ask the Court to excuse the non-attendance of the plaintiff in person and not to pass any further order insisting upon his personal attendance on a subsequent date. I also received from Mr. Sultan Ahmed, and accepted from him, his assurance that he had been instructed by the plaintiff personally to press the application of the 23rd of May, 1923, that is to say, the application compromising the suit. I was also fully awake to the fact that this application amounted in substance to a withdrawal of the suit by the plaintiff and an abandonment by him of the claim which he had preferred against the defendant. I dealt with the matter on the basis of a petition of compromise tendered to the Court by Mr. Sultan Ahmed, under instructions from his client, on the 11th June 1923. I am, therefore, not concerned to enquire into the precise circumstances under which the petition was presented to this Court on the 23rd of May, 1923, or the affidavit by which it was supported came to be sworn. I accepted Mr. Sultan Ahmed's assurance that his client had expressed to him a desire that he should represent him before the Court on the 11th of June, 1923, that he should ask the Court to excuse the personal attendance of the said client and that he should ask the Court to dispose of the suit in the terms of the petition of compromise which had been laid before me, in the first instance, on May the 23rd, 1923. After considering the affidavit now laid before me, I am of opinion that I was not only justified in accepting these assurances from Mr. Sultan Ahmed, but that I was bound to do so. In the face of these assurances, I disbelieve the statement made in paragraph 42 of the affidavit now before me. I take note that in paragraph 44 of the said affidavit, the plaintiff does not say that he did not instruct Mr. Sultan Ahmed to do any one of the things which he now knows that Mr. Sultan Ahmed did on his behalf on the 11th June 1923. What he says is that he represented to the said Counsel what he had been previously told to say by the defendant, and he asserts that he did this because he only saw Mr. Sultan Ahmed in the presence of the defendant and that the defendant had told him that he would come to serious grief if he failed to give Mr. Sultan Ahmed those instructions which he actually did give. The paragraph does not even assert that the plaintiff asked to be allowed to see Mr. Sultan Ahmed in private and without the presence of the defendant. To sum up the matter, it seems to me that the allegations in the affidavit before me are, in substance, that the plaintiff signed certain papers and swore a certain affidavit, without knowing the contents of those papers or of the affidavit, at a certain place in Allahabad on the 23rd of May 1923, at a time when he was suffering wrongful confinement at the hands of the defendant and the servants or agents of the defendant, and because he believed his life to be in danger at their hands if he refused to sign these papers and to swear this affidavit. I have not examined the officer before whom the affidavit was sworn; but there are in my opinion considerations apparent enough on the materials now before me to justify me in declining to take any action upon these allegations. I have asked whether any report was ever made to the police in Allahabad, or any complaint ever presented to a Magistrate of this place, in respect of the offences of wrongful confinement, criminal intimidation and extortion disclosed by paragraphs 25 to 31 of this affidavit, and I am informed that nothing of the sort was ever done. I have sufficient confidence in the official who certifies that the affidavit in question was solemnly affirmed before him to feel certain that he did not permit the plaintiff to affirm without first satisfying himself that the plaintiff was aware of the contents of the affidavit. Finally, I am of opinion that it is a question of minor or subsidiary importance to consider the circumstances under which this affidavit was sworn, or this petition presented to me on the 23rd of May 1923, seeing that my decision on the 11th June 1923, was wholly based upon the assurances given me by Mr. Sultan Ahmed.

For these reasons I am not of opinion that this is a case which calls for the exercise of any inherent powers which this Court may possess, in order to set aside the order of the 11th June, 1923, or the decree which followed thereon. As a question of law, I am further of opinion that the provisions of Order 47, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure would not warrant me in allowing this application on the basis of an application for review of judgment. The case is in my opinion obviously distinguishable from that reported in 44 Bom. 408. The Calcutta High Court has held that, where the attention of a Court is invited to the fact that some fraud has been practised upon a party in connection with a petition of compromise which has been accepted by a Court in which a suit was pending, that Court may apply the provisions of Order 47, rule 1, to set aside the order accepting the compromise, if satisfied that the alleged fraud has been practised. I cannot find any allegations of fraud in the affidavit before me. There are allegations which go far beyond the mere assertion that the plaintiff's assent to the compromise or withdrawal of his suit was obtained by undue influence. They are, as I have noted, assertions that the said compromise was obtained by the wrongful confinement of the plaintiff, by criminal intimidation and by extortion. Those assertions I distrust and I have given reasons for doing so sufficient to warrant me in taking no action upon the affidavit which contains them. Even in cases where fraud has been alleged, with that definiteness and fulness of specification which the law requires, the decisions of the Calcutta High Court which have been laid before me in argument, while asserting jurisdiction on the part of a Court to take up a petition like the one before me as a petition for review, on the strength of the words, "or for any other sufficient reason" in the aforesaid rule, express the opinion that the matter is one which should ordinarily be litigated in a separate suit. My own opinion is that the words, "or for any other sufficient reason", must be taken to refer to something ejusdem generis with the words that precede. My attention has been drawn to one case, not to be found in the authorised Law Reports, in which the Madras High Court held that a review of judgment could be granted in a case of fraud, where the circumstances were such that the Court could bring the case under the earlier provisions of Order 47, rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, by holding that the application for review was based upon the discovery of new and important matter. In so far as the affidavit laid before me in support of this application purports to refer to any new or important matter supposed to have come to the knowledge of the plaintiff since the 11th June, 1923, I disbelieve any allegations to this effect, principally by reason of the confidence which I feel in accepting the assurances given me on that date by Mr. Sultan Ahmed. For these reasons I reject this application.

Application rejected.

LINDSAY AND SULAIMAN, JJ.

Basdeo Rai and another—Defendants-Appellants

v.

Jhagru Rai—Plaintiff-Respondent.

F.A. No. 108 of 1923, decided on 28th January, 1924, from the order of Sub-Judge, Basti.

(a) Specific Relief Act, S. 27—Contract of pre-emption can be enforced against representatives—Case-law discussed.

If a contract of pre-emption be deemed to be a contract of sale it can be enforced under certain circumstances under S. 27 against the representatives of the original parties to the contract.

(b) Contract Act, S. 23—Contract of pre-emption is not against public policy—Case-law discussed.

In view of the fact that in the United Provinces contracts for pre-emption have been enforced for several years the contract of pre-emption cannot be deemed to be against public policy.

(c) Transfer of Property Act, S. 14—Contract of pre-emption being already recognised does not offend against the rule in S. 14—Case-law discussed.

In view of the fact that the different High Courts have recognised the contract of pre-emption, the contract cannot be deemed to offend against the rule of perpetuities and is therefore not invalid and unenforceable. Rules of English law must be applied to Indian Cases with great caution. (24 W.R. 321, Dist.)

(d) Transfer of Propetry Act, S. 40—Contract of pre-emption is enforceable against heirs of transferees with notice—Case-law discussed.

Under S. 40 contracts of pre-emption being valid contracts are enforceable against the personal heirs of the original parties as also against the transferee with notice until the settlement in the Record-of-Rights of which the contract was entered into is at an end.

(e) Contract Act, S. 29—Uncertainty.

Where the father and grandfather had apparently signed the Zamima Khewat and thereby assented to a contract of pre-emption, held, that there was no uncertainty as to their intention which was obviously to enter into a contract for the period of settlement.

Peary Lal Banerji—for Appellants.

Harnandan Prosad—for Respondent.

Lindsay, J.:—The material facts are set out in the order of my learned colleague.

On the evidence furnished by the "zamima khewat" which was drawn up in the year 1886, it has already been decided that there was a contract entered into in that year providing for a right of pre-emption. The period of the contract was the period of the settlement and that, as my learned brother has pointed out, was to come to an end on the 30th of June, 1919. It was, therefore, a contract for a definite period, and admittedly the sale now sought to be pre-empted was made on the 10th May, 1919, that is, within the period of the contract.

It is this sale which according to the plaintiff gives him his cause of action, and the question is whether he is entitled to enforce his right of pre-emption arising out of the contract, against the vendor and the purchaser.

It is found that the father of the plaintiff and the grandfather of the vendor signed the wajib-ul-arz and were, therefore, parties to the contract.

It has been argued before us that the contract for pre-emption cannot be enforced on the ground that it is void for uncertainty. A second argument is that such a contract should be held to be void because it is opposed to public policy. A third argument is that the contract is void for remoteness, or, to put it in other words because it is obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities. And lastly it is contended that in no case could such a contract bind the representative of the original parties.

With regard to the first argument I agree with my learned brother that no uncertainty attaches to the contract under consideration. As he points out, the intention was to contract for a definite period, namely, the period of the settlement.

As for the second argument it is quite untenable in a Province where pre-emption is recognized and encouraged.

As for the fourth argument, namely, that a contract of this nature can in no case bind the representatives of the parties, that is a matter to be decided by the enactment contained in section 37 of the Indian Contract Act. It is nothing to the point to say that a man cannot bind his representatives by entering into a contract giving rise to a right of pre-emption. Whether a person purports to bind his representatives or not, they will be bound by operation of law if the law declares them to be so bound, and such a declaration is contained in section 37 above referred to:—

> "Promises bind the representatives of the promisors in case of the death of such promisors before performance unless a contrary intention appears from the contract."

As is evident from illustration (b) to this section, the only exception to the rule arises in those cases in which the personal skill or the special competence of the promisor are relied upon. No such question can possibly arise in a contract giving rise to a right of pre-emption. A contract of that nature is within the general rule and can be enforced against the representatives of the promisor after his death.

There can be no difficulty in holding here that the promise can be enforced against the vendor, the grandson of the promisor and his representative within the meaning of section 37.

It remains then to be considered whether the plaintiff can enforce his right under the contract of pre-emption against the purchaser from the vendor. The law is that the liability under a contract cannot pass by an assignment which is the act of one of the parties to the contract. It may of course be transferred by agreement between the promisee and promisor in circumstances which amount to novation or the making of a fresh contract.

But the liability may be transferred by operation of law and it has to be seen, therefore, if the law, as we have it, declares that a contract giving rise to a right of pre-emption can be enforced against a third party, e.g., an assignee who was no party to the original contract.

We are thus brought to a discussion of the question whether a contract of this nature binds an assignee on the ground that it contains a covenant which, according to the phraseology of the English law, "runs with the land." In this connection the law to be considered in India is the law contained in section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act which lays down what rights or obligations may be enforced against a transferee of immoveable property.

Two classes of rights are referred to in the section. The first class consists of rights to restrain the enjoyment of land or to compel its enjoyment in a particular manner. These are the rights which arise under the "restrictive covenants" which are enforced in equity in England on the ground that the person entitled to the right has an "equitable interest" in the land or a right in the nature of an equitable easement.

This class of rights obviously does not include a right to enforce pre-emption.

The second class of rights is defined in the second clause of section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act.

"Where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property but not amounting to an interest therein or easement thereon."

It seems to me that a contract giving rise to a right of pre-emption clearly falls within this category.

The promisee in such a contract is clearly entitled to the benefit of the obligation entered into by the promisor, namely, that when he proposes to sell the land, he will give the promisee the first offer. The obligation of the promisor is annexed to the ownership of the land for it is in his quality as owner that he undertakes the obligation and the obligation concerns the land, for it is an obligation to offer the land in the first instance to the promisee in case a sale is being contemplated.

And, lastly, the benefit of the obligation which arises out of a contract for pre-emption is neither an interest in the land nor an easement thereon. It is obviously not an easement, and regard being had to the language of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, it cannot amount to an interest in the land. The section says that a contract for the sale (and therefore for the re-sale) of immoveable property does not of itself create "any interest in or charge on such property." The words are "any interest," and, in my opinion, preclude the notion that an interest even of an equitable nature arises out of such a contract. I am of opinion, therefore, that the obligation which springs from a contract giving rise to a right of pre-emption is clearly one which falls within the second clause of section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act and that the benefit of such an obligation, though it amounts neither to an interest in nor to an easement on land, is enforceable against the persons specified in the section, that is, transferees with notice or gratuitous transferees.

In England the doctrine appears to be that pre-emptive covenants or covenants for re-purchase give rise to an equitable interest in the land. The result is the creation of privity of estate between the person entitled to pre-empt and subsequent transferees and it is on this basis that covenants for pre-emption are enforced in equity against gratuitous transferees or transferees who take with notice of the covenant.

In India the right to enforce the covenant is given by statute, section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act where the right does not amount to an interest in land. I agree, therefore, with my learned brother when he points out that cases such as the one we have before us are not to be decided upon the doctrines of the English law but must be decided upon the law as enacted in India. I am satisfied that in the present case the right is enforceable against the transferee by purchase who cannot be allowed to plead want of notice of a contract contained in the wajib-ul-arz of the village in which the property is situated. There remains the argument about remoteness. It is said that such a contract offends against the rule relating to perpetuities as laid down in section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act.

But clearly that rule can only be applied in cases where there is an attempt to create an interest in property. A contract for a right of pre-emption or re-purchase does not give rise to any interest in immoveable property. The language of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act is clear upon that point. It follows that the rule against perpetuities cannot be invoked for the purpose of arguing that the contract with which we are concerned in this case is void for remoteness.

I have abstained from comment upon the numerous cases which have been cited before us in argument. They are all set out and discussed in the judgment of my learned colleague. I would only observe that it seems to me that in most, if not all, of the cases in India to which our attention has been drawn, the provisions of section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act have not received due consideration. In my opinion this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Sulaiman, J :—This is a defendants' appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emotion based on a sale-deed, dated the 10th of May, 1919. The suit was originally based on an alleged custom prevailing in the village, which was denied by the vendees. The Court of first instance, finding that no custom had been established and that the entry in the zamima khewat relied upon by the plaintiff was one of contract, dismissed the suit. On appeal the lower appellate Court came to the conclusion that even if no custom existed, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on the ground of a contract of pre-emption. It may be noted that the zamima khewat relied upon by the plaintiff was prepared at the time of the settlement of 1886 and according to the Gazetteer of the District of Basti, page 120. this settlement was to expire on the 30th of June, 1919. Thus the settlement was still in force at the time when the sale-deed in question was executed and when the alleged cause of action in the plaintiff's favour arose. The lower appellate Court accordingly set aside the decree of the first Court and remanded the case for trial on the merits. An appeal by the defendants was disposed of by a Bench of this Court of which the judgment is reported in 20 A. L. J. R. 464. This Court modified the order to this extent that it sent the case back to the first Court with direction to the plaintiff to amend his plaint so as to base his claim on the ground of contract also. As a result it may now be taken to be finally settled for the purposes of this case, that no custom of pre-emption has been proved to exist.

When the case went back to the original Court, the suit was again dismissed on the ground that there was no evidence on the record to show that either the plaintiff and his predecessors or the defendants and their predecessors had signed the zamima khewat which was prepared in place of the ordinary wajib-ul-arz. The lower appellate Court, however, admitted a complete copy of the whole record of rights and found that Gopal Rai, the father of the plaintiff Jhagru, and Dudhnath, the grand-father of the vendor Munna Rai, apparently signed it and were assenting parties to the contract. Relying on two cases of this Court, it held that in any case there was a pima facie presumption that the contract was made by all the then co-parceners and was binding upon them, and even an absence of their signatures would not justify an inference that they had not agreed to it. It accordingly sent the case back once again for disposal of the remaining issues.

The defendants have come up again in appeal to this Court and urge that the suit should have been dismissed. I may note that in the course of the argument no suggestion has been made that the plaintiff's father and the vendor's grand-father had not signed the zamima khewat. The points which the learned Advocate for the appellants has strongly urged may be enumerated as follows:—Firstly, that the contract of pre-emption was void for uncertainty. Secondly, that it was against public policy. Thirdly, that it offended the rule against perpetuities. And, fourthly, that in any case it cannot bind the representatives of the original parties to the contract.

The wajib-ul-arz or the zamima khewat does not embody the contract itself but is merely a prima facie evidence that such a contract was entered into by the co-sharers at the time of the settlement. In the absence of anything to the contrary, such a contract must be presumed to have been intended to hold good for the whole period of the settlement and not longer. In cases of districts which are not permanently settled, such settlements are ordinarily for fixed periods of 30 years. It cannot, therefore, be said that this contract of pre-emption was for such an unknown or indefinite period as to make it void for uncertainty. The intention of the co-sharers obviously was to enter into a contract for the period of the settlement. There is no uncertainty as to their intention. Section 29 of the Contract Act can, therefore, have no application. In the case of Bimal Jati v. Biranji Kuar (1) both Sir Arthur Strachey, C.J., and Banerji, J., remarked that such 'a covenant for pre-emption was not void for vagueness or uncertainty'. I may add that if the contract had been for an unlimited period of time, it might well have been contended that it was unenforceable against the heirs and the representatives as being too vague and uncertain.

So far as these provinces are concerned, it is not possible to contend that a contract of pre-emption is against public policy. It is well known that for a large number of years suits for pre-emption on he basis of contracts have been decreed by this Court. Futhermore, when in numerous villages even a custom of pre-emption has grown up and has been enforced, it cannot be said that a contract of pre-emption is against public policy.

Nor can, in my opinion, the rule of perpetuities apply under the Indian Law. It may be conceded that in England the view has been expressed that a covenant for re-purchase 'without any definite limit as to the period of time within which the covenant was to have effect' could not be enforced; vide the case of London and Sotuh Western Railway v. Gomm (2) and subsequent cases. It must, however, be borne in mind that the rules of English law have to be applied to Indian cases with great caution. In Gomm's case the ratio decidendi was that a contract of sale did create an equitable interest in land and was, therefore, within the rule of perpetuities. Cases in India, however, are governed by the Contract Act, the Transfer of Property Act and the Specific Relief Act. Section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (which came into force before Gomm's case was decided) expressly provides that a contract for the sale of immoveable property does not of itelf create "any interest in or charge on such property." In the face of an express statutory provision of this kind, it is impossible to urge that a contract of that kind creates any interest, legal or equitable, in the property at all. The rule against perpetuities is embodied in section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act and under it no transfer of property can operate to create an interest which is to take effect beyond the legal limit prescribed therein. When a contract of pre emption is entered into by the proprietors of a village, there is no transfer of any property affected at all. Section 14, therefore, in terms cannot apply to it. If it be conceded that a contract of pre-emption does not create any interest in land, it would be very difficult to contend that such a contract comes within the rule against perpetuities. Such a rule cannot apply unless an interest in land purports to have been created.

The learned Advocate for the appellants has strongly relied on a number of cases in support of his contention.

The earliest case is that of Tripoora Sundari v. Jugger Nath Dutt (3). That case was decided long before the Transfer of Property Act was passed and can, therefore, be easily distinguished.

The next important case is that of Nobin Chandra Soot v. Nawab Ali Sircar (4). In that case the contract was embodied in a private document and was to reconvey the land for a fixed consideration in the event of being called upon to quit it without specifying any period of time. The learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court quoted passages from English cases, principally that from Gomm's case, to the effect that a covenant of this character which bound the covenantor, to convey the property to the vendor 'without any definite limit as to the period of time within which the covenant was to have effect' could not be enforced. The view expressed therein was that no limit could be imposed upon the power of alienation which extends 'beyond any definite period' and which contravenes the doctrine of remoteness.

This last case was considered by two learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Kali Maddin Bhuya v. Reasuddin Ahmed (5) and was distinguished on the ground of there having been a devolution of interest of one of the parties by inheritance. The learned Judges, however, held that the covenant by itself was not void but was valid in law and could be enforced against the covenantor as well as a purchaser with notice from him, and a case of our Court was quoted with approval.

The next case is that of Nabin Chandra Sarma v. Rajani Chandra Chakraburty (6) There too the claim for pre-emption was based on a clause contained in a private document. Mukerji, A.C.J., remarked that it was > "firmly settled that an option to arise on any intended sale or other particular kind of alienation by the owner e.g. a right of pre-emption or first refusal, is subject to the rule against perpetuities, and to bind the land or property must comply with it unless the right is conferred by statute. It may be entirely void even where limited to a proper period, if intended merely as a total check on alienation by the owner".

At page 904 the learned Judge, in repelling the argument that in particular contingencies the covenant might not contravene the rule against perpetuities, remarked :

"To test whether a covenant violates the rule against perpetuities, we must look not to the particular events which may have actually happened but to all possible contingencies.....In the light of this principle, it is abundantly clear that the covenant in this case is obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities".

It is apparent that the learned Judge regarded such a covenant as altogether void and not only unenforcible against the representatives. This must of necessity be so; if a covenant does actually offend the rule against perpetuities, it is void ab initio. The logical conclusion to which one would then be driven would be that such a covenant cannot be enforced against even the parties to the contract. With great respect to the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court I think that the effect of the provision contained in section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act was altogether overlooked and the basic principle underlying the English cases that such a contract creates an interest in land so as to bring it within the rule of perpetuities, was not fully appreciated.

Tyabji, J., in a very learned judgment reported in Avula Chara Mudi v. Marriboyina Raghavulu (7), has most clearly brought out the great distinction which subsists between the rules of English law and the Indian Statutory law. He has pointed out that it is settled beyond argument that an agreement merely personal not creating any interest in land is not within the rule against perpetuities and he has shown how the English cases are on that ground clearly distinguishable and cannot apply to a case arising in India which is governed by the Contract Act, the Transfer of Property Act and the Specific Relief Act. He has also very cogently remarked that, if the right that is sought to be enforced were to depend upon the existence of an interest in the land and that interest itself were void in law as offending against the rule against perpetuities, it would not matter whether the persons that are before the Court are those who have themselves been parties to the transaction attempting to create the interest or that they are strangers or transferees. I fully agree with the view expressed by the learned Judges of the Madras High Court. In fact there is no good answer to the contention there put forward that if a covenant of this kind were to be avoided on the rule against perpetuities, the covenant must be deemed to be wholly void and not as if it were valid against the parties and invalid against their representatives.

Even in the judgement of this Court in Gopi Ram v. Jeot Ram (8), on which strong reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellants, it was conceded that a contract of sale of immoveable property as laid down in section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, if no interest is created in immoveable property under a contract of sale, the latter cannot be vitiated by the rule against perpetuities.

In view of these authorities and the statutory provisions in India, I am of opinion that the contract of pre-emption cannot be held to be invalid and unenforcible on the ground that it offends the rule against perpetuities.

The last point urged on behalf of the defendants-appellants is that even if such contract was not altogether void, it was certainly unenforcible against any persons other than the actual parties to the original contract. That at the time when the contract was entered into by the co-sharers it must have been contemplated by them that it would hold good during the whole period of the settlement, cannot seriously be disputed. We all know what the intentions of the proprietors at the settlement times usually are. They enter into a number of agreements, all ultimately recorded by the settlement officer, which are intended to be binding on the whole co-parcenary body while that settlement lasts. There cannot, therefore, be much doubt that the intention of the proprietors at the time when the contract was certified before the settlement officer, clearly was that it would be binding on all proprietors, whoever they may happen to be during the whole of the coming period of settlement. The question whether in point of law such an agreement could bind their representatives is of course quite another matter.

The line adopted by the learned advocate for the defendants-appellants has been that such a contract was in substance a contract entered into by the then proprietors for themselves as well as on behalf of their future heirs and representatives. The contention, therefore, is that these proprietors had no power whatsoever to enter into a contract on behalf of their future heirs and representatives, and if they did, that contract could not bind the latter. I am of opinion that this is not a correct appreciation of the position of the proprietors. They did not enter into any contract acting as agents of their future heirs or representatives, but they by virtue of their position as proprietors, entered into a contract themselves. If a contract entered into by them is held to be enforcible against their heirs or representatives also, it is not necessarily tantamount to holding that the proprietors had authority to enter into a contract as agents of their heirs and representatives. A contract of pre-emption in substance is a contract that before any share in the village is transferred to a stranger, an offer would be made to the other co-sharers, or to put it in a negative way, a contract that no transfer shall be effected to a stranger without an offer having first been made to the other co-sharers. Such a contract is made by the then proprietors in respect of the property which they hold at the time. No one says that it creates any interest in or charge or easement on that property. Nevertheless it is an agreement made in respect of their property and by virtue of their position as proprietors. If the law makes such contract of the then owners enforcible against their representatives, that necessarily does not confer on them a power to act as the agents of their representatives. In my opinion there is a clear distinction between the contract of A being enforcible under the law against his respresentatives and the power of A to enter into a contract on behalf of his representatives. The latter position cannot be maintained, but the former may well be consistent with the provisions of Statute. As a matter of fact it is well known that claims of pre-emption are brought after the property has been transferred and they are enforced against the stranger transferees, who were no parties to the contract.

(7) (1915) 39 Mad. 462.

(8) 1923 All. 514.

If the contract entered into by the proprietors was not void on the ground of uncertainty or as being against public policy or as offending the rule against perpetuities, then the question is why could it not be enforced against his legal representatives? Section 37 of the Indian Contract Act provides generally that 'promises bind the representatives of the promisors unless a contrary intention appears from the contract.' I have already remarked that there can be no doubt that a contract of pre-emption when entered into by the proprietors for the time being is intended to be binding on all the co-sharers whoever they may be during the whole period of the settlement. In such a contract there is nothing to show a contrary intention not to bind the representatives. If a contract of pre emption be treated as nothing more nor less than a contract of sale, then under section 27 of the Specific Relief Act such a contract can, under certain circumstances, be enforced against the representatives of the original parties to the contract.

Again, section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act lays down a statutory provision which requires a careful consideration. I am aware that in none of the cases cited before us section 40 was applied to a contract of pre-emption. Nevertheless I have come to the conclusion that such a contract must come within the wide scope of that section. That section provides that

> "Where, for the more beneficial enjoyment of his own immoveable property, a third person has, independently of any interest in the immoveable property of another or of any easement thereon, a right to restrain the enjoyment of the latter property or to compel its enjoyment in a particular manner, or where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property, but not amounting to an interest therein or easement thereon, such right or obligation may be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof or a gratuitous transferee of the property affected thereby, but not "against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right or obligation, nor against such property in his hands."

I concede that a right of pre-emption, which may be described as a right of first refusal, cannot be described to be a right to restrain the enjoyment of the others' property or to compel its enjoyment in a particular manner. There is really no restraint on the enjoyment of the property at all. The occasion for the right arises when the owner wishes to exercise his right to dispose of it and is most often enforced after the disposition has been actually made. I am however distinctly of opinion that such a contract does come within the second part of the section. When all the proprietors enter into an agreement by which they bind themselves by virtue of their position as proprietors that within a time fixed no transfer shall be effected without a first offer having been made to the other co-sharers, they are entering into a contract out of which an obligation arises on each, to the benefit of the other co-sharers, and which obligation is annexed to the ownership of the immoveable property (not annexed to the property itself) and does not amount to an interest therein or easement thereon. The section speaks of the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and not only arising out of a breach of contract. It follow that the section would apply when a contract subsists, even though no occasion has arisen for its performance, and even though no breach has actually taken place. In cases other than that of pre-emption, there may be a suit to restrain an apprehended infringement. The only other words in the section which require some consideration are the words 'annexed to the ownership.' This latter expression cannot be understood to mean 'creating any interest or charge in the land but simply 'relating to the ownership', or 'by virtue of the right of proprietorship'. It is apparent to my mind that a contract of pre-emption entered into by the proprietors though a personal one, in the sense that it creates no interest in land, is also entered into by virtue of their position as proprietors and is entered into in respect of their property and must from its very nature be deemed to have been annexed to their ownership. Having regard to the true conception of such a contract of pre-emption, I am of opinion that, though not amounting to an interest in or easement on land, it certainly creates a benefit of an obligation in favour of the other parties and is attached to their proprietorship. Such a contract, therefore, under the law can be enforced against all gratuitous transferees and even against transferees for consideration with notice. A fortiori such a contract could not be held to be unenforcible against the heirs of the contracting parties. If my interpretation of the section is correct then we have a statutory provision which makes contracts of pre-emption enforcible against the representatives of the original parties. No question of its offending against any supposed rule of perpetuities or its being against public policy would then arise. On the other hand, if the Calcutta view were carried to its logical conclusion, then not only a covenant for pre-emption, but even a contract for sale or a contract for reconveyance within a fixed period would become unenforcible as soon as any of the original parties dies. That is to say, if A sells his property to B absolutely and B enters into a separate and independent contract with A for consideration, undertaking that the property would be reconveyed if the amount is repaid, within, say a year, and, unfortunately for A, B dies within that time, the former can never get back the property. I find myself unable to accept this view.

I think that a contract of pre-emption can be enforced against the personal representatives as well as transferees as the original parties in the same manner and to the same extent as the restrictive covenants mentioned in the earlier part of section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act.

It may, however, be contended that the application of section 40 to a contract of pre-emption is not supported by any authority in the sense that, so far as is known, it has not been directly applied to a suit for pre-emption based on contract. Even accepting this to be so, I must say that my conception of a contract of pre-emption is quite consistent with the conception which has found favour with a number of learned Judges of this Court.

The earliest case that I may refer to is the Full Bench case of Ishri Singh v. Ganga (9). Oldfield, J., remarked in that case that "when a wajib ul-arz records a right of pre-emption by contract between the share-holders, it is evidence of a contract binding all the parties" to it and their representatives, and there will be a presumption that all the share-holders assented to the making of the entry and in consequence were assenting parties to the contract of which it is evidence and it will be however open to those repudiating the contract to rebut the presumption". Similarly Spankie, J., remarked that "when such a document has been attested before the settlement officer, such a record is prima facie binding on all the co-sharers, and cannot be repudiated by any one succeeding to or acquiring a share except as permitted by section 91 of the old Rent Act." Pearson, J., agreed with the opinion expressed by Oldfield, J., and Straight, J., agreed with the opinion expressed by Spankie, J.

I would next refer to another Full Bench case of Karim Bakhsh Khan v. Phula Bibi (10). Pethram, C. J., there remarked: "It has always been considered—and this view has been acted upon—that agreement of this nature runs with the land to this extent, that a co-sharer wishing to purchase, and to whom the property has not been offered, can follow it in the hands of the vendee and get possession of it himself. If this is so, the agreement so far runs with the land; and if it does so to any extent, it must, in my opinion, do so to the full extent of the agreement." Straight, J., Oldfield, J., and Broadhurst, J., agreed with that opinion, and so did Tyrell, J.

The conception of a contract of pre-emption having such a connection with land as to bind representatives of the original parties can also be gathered from other Division Bench cases. In Gokal Singh v. Mannu Lal (11), where the pre-emption clause was based on a contract, Mahmud, J., in a separate written judgment, which does not fully appear in the report, remarked: "The mere apportionment of revenue and the disseverance of the liability to that revenue could not, ipso facto, defeat a covenant relating to pre-emption entered into by all the co-sharers for the time being, and which covenant ran as an incident of the tenure of the lands owned by them before such partition."

In the case of Kunwar Dat Prasad Singh v. Nohar Singh (12) it was again remarked that 'this pre-emptive right runs with the land.'

In Ram Jiwan Sahu v. Rituraj Singh (13), it was again held that 'the right of pre-emption was one created by agreement between the co-sharers of the village, and constituted a covenant which attached to and ran with the land.'

It is true that these cases were referred to by Strachey, C.J., in the leading judgment which he delivered in the Full Bench case of Dalganjan Singh v. Kalka Singh (14). At page 19 he remarked: "I cannot agree.....with the conception of pre-emption as a covenant running with the land.....To describe pre-emption as a covenant running with the land is to misapply a technical term of the English real property law." The point was not at all necessary for decision in that case, but the remark is entitled to great weight. All that the learned Chief Justice, however, meant was that it was improper to import the technical expression 'covenant running with the land' from the English real property law and apply it to pre emption as understood in India. No one can dispute the correctness of that observation. The expression 'covenant running with the land' is a technical expression which has a special meaning in the English real property law. It is certainly not proper to say that pre-emption is a covenant running with the land in the sense in which that expression is used in English law. What, however, had been expressed in previous cases was that the right was of such a nature as not only to affect the persons who were actual parties to the contract but also their representatives. Even after the observations of Strachey, C.J., a Bench of this Court in Bahadur Singh v. Ram Singh (15) again used the expression 'run with the land'.

In view of the conception of an agreement of pre-emption as entertained by so many Judges of this Court, who had a vast experience of pre-emption cases, I am of opinion that its obligation must be deemed to be annexed to the ownership of land though not annexed to the land itself. Even bearing in mind that section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act has not so far been applied to a covenant of pre-emption, I have come to the conclusion that its language covers such a right. That section was not directly considered in any of the cases which have so far held that such a right was unenforceable against the representatives.

Coming to the two recent cases of the Allahabad High Court, Balli Singh v. Raghubar Singh (16) and Gopi Ram v. Jeot Ram (8), I must at once mention that the previous Allahabad cases to which I have referred, were not at all cited before the Bench nor was the applicability of section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act pressed. I may also add that the learned Judges were to a great extent influenced by the circumstance that in both of those cases the contract was intended to be operative for an unlimited period of time. At page 414 it was remarked 'the village being permanently settled, no time is fixed for the revision of record, and that therefore the covenant might bind people for an indefinite period.' Similarly in the latter case, at page 433, it was pointed out that the agreement was to re-convey the land whenever demanded to do so on the payment of a certain sum and that 'there was no limit of time in which the sale was to be re-made.' On the same page it was further remarked that it was doubtful whether the provisions of section 37 of the Contract Act enabled an owner of an immoveable property to enter into an agreement with another imposing a restrictive covenant for an indefinite period on the disposition of the said property so as to bind his heirs and representatives.

It is, therefore, possible to distinguish both these cases on the ground that the contract was intended to be enforced for an indefinite period of time. In the present case however, it has already been noted that the contract could not have been intended to be operative beyond the period of about 30 years fixed for the settlement of 1886. The learned Judges had before them certain observations contained in the judgment of the Madras High Court in the case of Avula Charamudi v. Marriboyina Raghavalu (7) as against the Calcutta cases as well as two Bombay cases. They came to the conclusion that "the balance of authority appears to be on the side of the vendees." Main reliance was placed on the remarks of Macleod, J., in the case of Dinkarrao Ganpatrao v. Narain Vishnath (17), quoted as follows:—"The principle which underlies the rules of perpetuities applies to this class of contracts." These exact words are, however, to be found in the head-note and not in the judgment itself, though they may well be taken to represent the gist of his conclusion. At page 206 the learned Chief Justice remarked that contracts creating a right of pre-emption which cannot be specifically enforced until the proper occasion arises in the future, "do not according to the law in India create an interest in land either equitable or executory;" they do create rights which are capable of being enforced with regard to the land in certain circumstances against third parties, and then after referring to the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the case of Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Balchand (1), he remarked at page 210, "but the judgment indicates that in spite of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act the agreement could be read as creating an interest of such a nature as to bring the agreement itself within the rule against perpetuities". I know of no authority for saying that where no interest in land, legal or equitable, present or future, is purported to have been created and the rule against perpetuities does not apply, the principle underlying that rule can apply. I would say with great respect that that deduction does not follow from the judgment referred to above and that in any case it would not apply to a covenant for pre-emption. In the Bombay case the agreement purported to give his heirs a right to buy the land at the original price and was unlimited in point of time. I may also add that another learned Judge of the Bombay High Court, i.e., Pratt, J., had been of opinion that "if the intention was merely to create a personal obligation, the covenant is good and binding on the covenantor and covenantee and their personal representatives", but he held that it created no future right in rem.

Now, the Privy Council case of Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Balchand (18), was of a peculiar nature inasmuch as the plaintiffs had not sued for specific performance but on title, alleging apparently that the agreement amounted to a grant, and that the plaintiffs had taken possession of the land and were then dispossessed. While referring to the plaintiffs' contention that the contract was binding upon the assigns under section 40 of Act IV of 1882 because that Act was passed before the decision in South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm (19), and was not confined to restrictive covenants but applied to every obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property, Chamber, C.J., remarked: "Assuming that that contention was correct, we have to consider next whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the suit." In his opinion the plaintiff had "failed to prove any title to the land in suit". Their Lordships of the Privy Council in affirming the decree pointed out that " for the appellants, therefore, to succeed, it is essential to show that this agreement created in them some present estate or interest which would prevent the Raja from having made the grant ". That could only be effected by reading the deed as a grant in perpetuity which could not be done. The covenant in that case was to the effect that if the plaintiff society should require any place on the hill for erecting Mandir and Dharamsala, and for doing repairs and making bricks for the said purpose, in that case the Raja and his heirs should give land, stones from the hill and timber free of costs. Their Lordships remarked that such a covenant did not and could not run with the land and could not be so enforced. Their Lordships further remarked that if the deed be regarded as an agreement to grant in the future whatever land might be selected as a site for a temple as the only interest created would be one to take effect by entry at a latter date, and as this date is uncertain the provision is bad as offending the rule against perpetuities for the interest would not then vest in presenti, but would vest at the expiration of an indefinite time which might extend beyond the expiration of the proper period.

It is to be noted that the deed in question had been executed on May 16th, 1872, long before the Transfer of Property Act came into force, and its validity had to be tested according to the rules of the English law and independently of the provisions of section 54 and section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is also noteworthy that the covenant was quite unlimited in point of time and was sought to be enforced against transferees from transferees. I should further like to point out that the covenant in that case is clearly distinguishable from a covenant for pre-emption which neither creates any present interest in land nor is an agreement to grant in the future any interest in land. It is not as if any legal or equitable interest, present or future were created in the land. The right is enforced as a mere contract, and is enforced against the representatives of the original parties under the statutory provisions contained in section 37 of the Contract Act, section 27 of the Specific Relief Act and section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act. When a covenant of pre-emption does not amount to any interest present or future in immoveable property, it is difficult to see how it would come within the rule against perpetuities. And if it did, it would be void altogether and not only partially invalid.

The period of 30 years fixed for the ordinary settlements is after all not so unconscionably long as necessarily to exceed the legal limit prescribed under section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act, viz., the life-time of one or more persons living at the date of such transfer (or agreement) and the minority of some persons who shall be in existence at the expiration of the period. Further, the provision in section 40 regarding notice indirectly imposes a time-limit as for all practical purposes the proof of actual notice will become more and more difficult with the lapse of time.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the contract of pre-emption as evidenced by the entry in the record of rights was not unenforceable against the personal heirs of the original parties, or their transferees with notice, so long as the settlement continued. I may say that the question whether in any particular case the transferee had or had not notice is one of fact which if raised has to be determined on the evidence.

The present case can also, in my opinion, be disposed of on a shorter ground. The parties to the original contract were the father of the plaintiff and the grandfather of the vendor. Both were Hindus and prima facie they formed joint Hindu families. Managers of Hindu families are the agents of those families for the purposes of contracts with other parties. They represent their respective families to the outside world. A contract which is entered into by such a manager is a contract entered into not only on his behalf but on behalf of his family of which he is a member. The contracting parties, therefore, are the two families represented by the two managers, and the contract is binding not only on the signatories to it but the families on whose behalf they are entering into the contract. In this view of the matter it is apparent that no question of this contract being enforced against the personal representatives of the original parties at all arises. The famalies are still the same though the members of it may have changed. The contract was by one family in favour of the other and was to hold good during the whole period of the settlement. So long as these families are existing entities and are recognised by law as such, the contracts entered into between them are binding on them. The defendant-vendees cannot escape from the obligation by simply saying that the original signatories to the contract are dead. If those signatories had authority to bind their respective families, then the families are bound even after the deaths of their agents. The contract, therefore, is really being enforced against the original party to it, viz.: the vendor's family and its present transferees.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the lower appellate Court remanding the suit with direction to dispose of the other issues involved in the case was correct, and I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

By the Court:—The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

STUART and MUKERJI, JJ.

Emperor—Appellant

v.

Panna Lal—Respondent.

Crl. Ref. No. 651 of 1923, decided on 3rd January, 1924.

Crim. Pro. Code, S. 307—Verdict should be interfered with only when it is perverse or when it is manifestly wrong.

The High Court has full powers to re-open matters in connection with a verdict of acquittal by a jury where the Sessions Judge has disagreed with the verdict and has referred the case to the High Court under the section. But the High Court should interfere only when the verdict is perverse or clearly and manifestly wrong. This principle will secure the object of the legislature in creating juries. Any undue interference with the verdict of a jury tends to diminish the sense of responsibilty which it is desirable a jury ought to cherish.

Penal Code, S. 376—Evidence.

In no cases is it more difficult to arrive at a confident verdict whether evidence is false or true than in cases in which women allege that they have been outraged or that an outrage has been attempted on them. Not only one has to consider the possibility of deliberate falsehood but those who have to arrive at a verdict have to consider the possibility of unintentional mis-statements produced by hysterial conditions which are apt to be found in cases of this nature.

Assistant Government Advocate—for the Crown.

J. M. Bannerji—for Opposite party.

Stuart, J.:—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of Benares under section 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure submitting a case in which a certain Panna Lal was unanimously acquitted by a jury on a charge of attempted rape. Before we proceed to a consideration of the facts we deem it advisable to state what powers are given to us under the law to deal with such references and the manner in which we consider those powers should be used. Under the provisions of section 307 a High Court has very full powers to re-open all matters in connection with a verdict of acquittal of a jury with which the Sessions Judge has disagreed and which he has referred to the Court under the provisions of that section. But it does not follow that because powers have been given to the Court the Court should feel justified in using those powers to the full. There have been two schools of thought both before and after the amendment of the law which took place in 1896 as to the correct legal principles to be adopted in such circumstances. One school has considered that a High Court should not interfere with a verdict unless it is perverse and clearly and manifestly wrong. The other school has held the opinion that in such cases the High Court should re-open the matter ab initio and apply an independent mind to the evidence and form its own conclusions thereon. It cannot be suggested that the view taken by the first school is an improper one. The High Court may exercise any of the powers which it may exercise on appeal but it is perfectly within its rights in considering that in cases such as these interference should only be permitted in cases of perversity or clear and manifest error and that where a jury has arrived at a verdict which is not perverse and not clearly and manifestly wrong such verdict should not be interfered with although it is perfectly possible to form a not unreasonable opinion contrary to the opinion taken by the jury. The advantage of adopting this course is that it secures the object of the legislature in creating Juries. If the other view be taken and the case is re-opened ab initio it is somewhat difficult to see what useful function is performed by a jury. For in every case in which the Judge does not agree with their verdict the case can be referred to the High Court which then proceeds to try in de novo. We have no hesitation in adopting the view that we should not interfere unless the verdict is perverse or clearly and manifestly wrong. This is the view which was adopted prior to 1898 by the Bombay High Court in the case of Reg. v. Khanderav Bajirav (1) and the principles were laid down as aptly as they could be laid down by West, J., at page 13 :

"Trial by jury is a recent institution in India ; the Judge may differ from the jury as to the facts, and the duty of dealing with a case of that kind is then cast upon the High Court. On a reference by the Sessions Judge, the whole case is opened up. The section we have quoted lays down that the Court may acquit or convict without reference to the charges made against the accused. In other words, the functions both of the Judge and jury are cast upon the Court, and this differentiates our position very widely from that of the Courts in England.

Notwithstanding this difference, however, and the more onerous duties devolving in consequence on the High Courts in India, we still desire to be guided, as far as may be, by the analogies of the English law. It is a well recognized principle that the Courts in England will not set aside the verdict of a jury, unless it be perverse and patently wrong, or may have been induced by an error of the Judge. We adhere generally to this principle, notwithstanding our large discretionary powers first, on the constitutional ground of taking as little as possible out of the hands to which it has been primarily assigned by the legislature, and secondly because any undue interference may tend to diminish the sense of responsibility which it is desirable that a jury should cherish."

The same view was taken by a Bench of this Court in Emperor v. Chirkua (2). This being our opinion as to the principle of law which should guide us, we now turn to the facts of the case.

The acquitted man Panna Lal was charged with having in company with another man enticed on to the roof of a deserted building standing in a small garden in the heart of Benares City a young low caste Hindu married woman of some 14 years of age. The two men according to the girl complainant having obtained her presence in this place proceeded to throw her down and commit acts which could undoubtedly be only considered, if they really happened, to be acts committed preparatory to the commission of a rape. The Magistrate who committed the case and the Judge who heard it believed the girl to be telling the literal truth. There was certain corroborative evidence, which the Judge believed, to the effect that on the roof where the offence was said to have been committed were found the fragments of broken glass bangles of a pattern similar to the pattern which the girl was wearing at the time she made her first complaint. There was further evidence of neighbours who stated that their attention was attracted by the outcries of the girl so that they arrived upon the scene of the occurrence and saw Panna Lal and his companion running through a gap in the wall of the garden. If upon this evidence the jury had arrived at a verdict of "guilty" it certainly would have been difficult to criticise that verdict. But in our opinion we cannot say that their verdict of "not guilty" was perverse or clearly and manifestly wrong. It is a common-place to those experienced in the administration of criminal law that in no cases is it more difficult to arrive at a confident verdict as to whether evidence is false or true than in cases in which women allege that they have been outraged or that outrage has been attempted upon them. Not only has one to consider the possibility of deliberate falsehood but those who have to arrive at a verdict have to consider the possibility of unintentional misstatements produced by hysterical conditions which are apt to be found in cases of this nature. The difficulties are increased when from the nature of the charge there can be no physical trace of outrage such as in a case of attempted rape. There are peculiarities about this case and there are distinct discrepancies in the evidence. Panna Lal may be guilty of the offence or he may not. But this much we are able to say with certainty. We see no reason to suppose that the jury did not give an honest and a not unreasonable verdict and in these circumstances we find it impossible to interfere with that verdict. We accordingly acquit the accused of the offence upon the charge framed and direct that he be at once released from custody.

Accused acquitted.

Lachhman—Appellant

v.

Emperor—Respondent.

Cr. A. No. 992 of 1923, decided on 17th December, 1923, from the order of 2nd Addl. Sessions Judge, Cawnpore.

Penal Code, S. 84—Knowledge that an act is wrong along with unsound mind is not covered by S. 84.

Where the accused was of a unsound mind at the time of committing the murder but he knew perfectly well that he was doing a wrong thing, held, that S. 84 did not apply to the case but that capital sentence should not be passed. The proper course is to sentence him to transportation for life so that he could be kept under observation. If the accused continues in a stage of apparent sanity for a sufficiently long period the local Government can pass such orders as clemency may suggest upon satisfactory medical report.

Government Advocate—for the Crown.

Stuart, J.:—This case presents unusual features. There is not the slightest doubt that on the 18th of August, 1923, Lachhman, appellant, murdered a man of the same name in the village of Samadhanpurwa. These are the circumstances. Lachhman, appellant, is a Pasi. The deceased man was a chamar. It is established to our satisfaction that for some time previous to this occurrence the appellant had shown peculiarities from which it can only be inferred that he was at that period insane. We are satisfied that he used to talk wildly and incoherently, tear up his clothes, strip himself stark naked in public, and we see no reason to distrust the evidence which would show that he besmeared himself occasionally with faecal matter. His family believing him to be insane sent for the deceased man Lachhman, chamar, who had a reputation as an exorcisor of evil spirits to remove the insanity by exorcism. Apparently the presence of Lachhman chamar, irritated the appellant to such an extent that he attacked him. There can be no doubt as to the fact that he did attack him with a heavy bullet of wood and inflicted terrible injuries all over his body, smashing his head and breaking both his arms. These injuries resulted in the death of Lachhman chamar. The appellant was at once seized and tied with a rope to a pillar. He broke away, ran to the river Ganges and plunged in. He was taken out and kept in custody until the police arrived. These facts admit of no doubt.

When the appellant was put upon his trial he had recovered his senses. The Civil Surgeon, whose evidence we see no reason to discredit, has said in his evidence that for the period of 15 days the appellant was under his observation he was not insane and it would appear that his mind was not deranged to a very serious extent while he was on trial. It is, however, to be remarked that certain of his answers in the case indicate that his mentality was far from normal while under his examination but on the evidence he knew the nature of his act and knew that what he was doing was wrong and contrary to law. I had to deal with a similar case some years ago and stated my views as to the law governing such cases therein. See Muhammed Hasan v. King-Emperor (1). I have nothing to add to what I stated then as to the law, and would suggest the same action against this man as was taken in that case. This is certainly in my opinion not a case in which the capital sentence should be passed. At the same time the benefit of section 84 of the Indian Penal Code cannot be extended to the appellant. I would suggest that the sentence be altered into one of transportation for life and that the case be reported to the Local Government for special consideration. The same course was pursued in the former case.

Mears, C. J.:—I think the evidence establishes that this man was suffering from a type of insanity known as folie circulaire, that is a type of insanity which commences of abnormality of conduct on the part of the sufferer. That abnormality of conduct increases by degrees until a period is reached when the man is manifestly insane. That is when the disease is at its height. Gradually the man gets better, the abnormality ceases and for a period he again becomes perfectly sane. After a time abnormality begins again and so the circle continues with alternating periods of lunacy, abnormality and insanity. I am of opinion from the evidence that although this man was of unsound mind at the time when he committed the deed, he knew perfectly well he was doing what was a wrong thing to do; and that being so he cannot claim the exemption of section 84.

(1) (1918) 15 O. C. 321.

I agree that the proper course is to alter the nature of the sentence and to sentence him to transportation for life, so that he can be kept under observation. If he is for a sufficiently long period a man of apparent sanity, it is always competent to the Local Government to pass such order as clemency may suggest, upon satisfactory medical certificates.

By the Court:—The order is that the conviction be upheld and the sentence be reduced to transportation for life, and that the case be reported to the Local Government with a copy of this judgment.

Conviction upheld, sentence reduced.

Moti Ram—Defendant-Appellant

v.

Kunwar Md. Abdul Jalil Khan—Plaintiff-Respondent.

F. A. No. 29 of 1921, decided on 14th February, 1924, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Aligarh.

Companies Act, VI of 1882, S. 4.

The word 'person' can be used to include a number of persons such as joint Hindu family or a varying number of beneficiaries who may from time to time become interested in the trust property. Thus a person figuring in a different capacity in the constitution of a company is to be treated as one member.

P. L. Bannerji and Panna Lal—for Appellant.

Abu Ali and Iqbal Ahmed—for Respondent.

Mears, C.J.:—This is an appeal from a preliminary decree in which the defendants were held liable to account to the plaintiff for the profits in a Cotton Ginning Factory which had accrued on the shares originally held by one Kunwar Muhammed Abdul Ghafur Khan, a deceased ancestor of the plaintiff. The original defendants were Moti Ram and Lala Har Prasad. The latter died during the pendency of the suit and his heirs have been duly brought on the record. They have not appealed from the preliminary decree. Moti Ram, the present appellant, was sued in the character of an agent who had received moneys as and for the use of the plaintiff. He was alleged to be withholding a sum which with interest amounted to over Rs. 35,000. He admitted that there was a considerable sum of undistributed profit. The principal point upon which he relied as enabling him to retain this money was that the Company was an illegal association inasmuch as it consisted of more than 20 persons and therefore violated the conditions of section 4 of the Indian Companies Act of 1882 which prohibits the formation of an unregistered company in excess of that number. If, in our opinion, the appellant is wrong in that contention then the appeal must fail. The Companies Act of 1882 nowhere defines 'person.' We are therefore, thrown back upon the General Clauses Act (No. X of 1897) 'Person' is there defined to include any Company or Association or body of individuals whether incorporated or not. It is therefore, obvious that 'person' can be used to include a collection of people and an appropriate illustration which will at once occur to Indian lawyers is that association of individuals known as a joint Hindu family. Analogous thereto are the varying number of beneficiaries who are from time to time interested beneficially in property vested in a trustee or trustees. The obligations of the appellant and the representatives of Har Prasad as agents are contained in an agreement which is one of partnership and also one of agency; it is dated the 20th of August, 1910, and omitting for a moment the consideration of the legality or otherwise of the inception of the contract the liability to account was in that agreement clearly provided for; nor is there any dispute as to the actual failure to deliver accounts throughout the period as to which default is alleged.

The appellant takes his stand as we have said on the illegality of the above mentioned agreement. He contends that on an investigation and enumeration of the persons beneficially interested in the partnership their number amounts to more than 20. The number of the various members of the partnership enumerated as they themselves thought correct, amount exactly to 20. Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, however, contends that inasmuch as Moti Ram scheduled as holding shares on behalf of his two grandsons, his name should be cut out and the beneficiaries, his two grandsons substituted in it. It may be noticed that Moti Ram is himself beneficially interested in another block of shares. No. 12 is given as:—

"Mt. Mohani.....for self and guardian of Moti Lal, minor adopted son of Ganeshi Lal."

The appellant's contention as regards this lady is that she must be counted as one person in respect of her own personal interest in that block of shares and a second person by reason of her holding an interest in the Company as the guardian of Moti Lal. If both these points were conceded, namely, the cutting out of Moti Ram's name at No. 4 and the substitution of his two grandsons and if the name of Moti Lal the adopted son of Ganeshi Lal had also to be added at No. 12 in addition to the name of Mt. Mohani then the number of persons would undoubtedly be over the prescribed limit of 20. We, however, do not agree with the view put forward by the appellant and it is to be noticed that at page 25 where the agreement is set out Moti Ram is in fact counted as two persons that is to say he is counted in respect of the block of shares of which he should receive the profit to his own use and benefit and also of the shares which he holds as trustee for his two grandsons; even on that assumption the number of persons do not exceed 20. We do not agree with the view that the name of Moti Ram must give place to that of his two grandsons, nor do we agree that it is necessary to indicate as regards Mt. Mohani and Moti Lal that both of their names should be reckoned in the constitution of this Company. In fact there were, as the appellant would wish us to delete or to accept, two Moti Rams. There was throughout the whole transaction one Moti Ram to whom the Company was accountable. In the same way the Company was accountable only to the one lady Mt. Mohani independently of the circumstance that she in her turn would be accountable to Moti Lal, the adopted son of Ganeshi Lal in respect of whatever interest he happened to hold in the Company through her as trustee. Again as regards Moti Ram it is to be noted that the contracting person in the first instance was the same Moti Ram who had a personal interest in the Company and the appellant and Har Prasad were bound to account to him and to him alone both for the shares in which he had his own beneficial interest and the shares which he held as a trustee for his grandsons. A similar consideration applies to the case of No. 8 Bithal Das who as guardian of his minor son Kishen Gopal also figures with another man as a proprietor having a direct beneficial interest in the partnership. But the accountability of the Company to Bithal Das was an accountability to him alone both as regards his beneficial interest and as regards the shares which he held in a representative capacity for other persons. The number however would exceed 20 if certain persons presumably members of a joint Hindu family and so found by the Judge were in fact separate and thus capable of being regarded as separate contracting parties. The learned Subordinate Judge considered all the arguments put forward and came to the conclusion that the persons alleged to be joint were in truth joint and could be represented by one member of the joint family and that as regards the others, specially, Moti Ram and Mt. Mohani and Bithal Das, that in truth they had been accurately described in the agreement. When these principles are applied to the document in question it becomes clear that the partnership certainly did not exceed 20 and probably did not exceed 18 persons. Agreeing with the learned Subordinate Judge we hold that the partnership was not invalid in its inception and that the appellant and the representative of Har Prasad are accountable to the plaintiff for his share in the profits for the period claimed. We also agree with the lower Court that the plaintiff having procured a succession certificate for the shares in the Factory can maintain the action for profits. We therefore dismiss the appeal with costs and fees on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Raghubar Dayal and another—Defendants-Appellants

v.

Secretary of State—Plaintiff-Respondent.

F. A. No. 95 of 1921, decided on 19th February, 1924, from the decree of Sub-Judge, Meerut.

Cantonment — Regulation allowing sale to Civilians with sanction of military authorities creates licenses in favour of grantees—Transfer without consent justifies a suit for declaration.

Where Army Regulations were in force by which a house could not be sold at all to Civilians and later on it was allowed to be sold with the sanction of the commanding officer, held, in the absence of evidence as to the actual terms, it must be presumed that the permission was subject to a reservation about sanction. Therefore every transfer made with the permission of the military authority must be treated as indicating an admission of a new license upon the prevailing conditions. Held further, that a transfer without sanction furnished a cause of action for a declaration that it was not binding on the Secretary of State.

Per Sulaiman, J.—The rights of the occupier to sell the materials of the house are not affected by the Regulation.

Army Regulations Vol. II, App. IV.

The rules in App. IV of Vol. II have no force as law, and a transfer which is valid under the ordinary law cannot be invalidated by contravention of those rules but where a person takes a grant of cantonment land subject to those rules he would be bound by them.

B. E. O'Conor and K. N. Katju—for Appellants.

L. M. Bannerji—for Respondent.

Lindsay, J.:—This appeal has arisen out of a suit filed by the Secretary of State for India in Council in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that a deed of sale executed by the first defendant, Raghubar Dayal in favour of the second defendant Mr. Thomas Singlehurst on the 28th July, 1919, and registered on the 9th August, 1919, was null and void and ineffectual on the ground that the previous consent of the military authorities had not been obtained, and that the transfer was detrimental to the interests of the military officers in the Meerut Cantonment.

The reason for the suit is indicated in para. 6 of the plaint.

Under section 11 (c) of the Cantonments (House Accommodation) Act of 1902 (Act II of 1902) which was in force at the time the suit was brought, no notice under section 6 of the Act can issue in respect of a house in Cantonments occupied by the owner; in other words where the owner of such a house is in actual occupation he cannot be required, by notice under section 6, to let the house to a military officer. The declaration sought for in the plaint was therefore being asked for in order to have it established that the military authorities were not under any legal obligation to treat the second defendant, Singlehurst, as the owner of the house conveyed by the deed in question for the purposes of the Act just referred to.

The house is described as Bungalow No. 42, Bedford Row in the Meerut Cantonment.

It is not disputed in this case that the land upon which this bungalow stands is cantonment land and therefore the property of Government. Nor is it disputed that at the time when this conveyance was executed the vendor, Raghubar Dayal, was entitled to be treated as the owner of the house.

The case for the plaintiff was that the relations between him and the defendant Raghubar Dayal were governed by certain rules set forth in Appendix IV, Volume II of Army Regulations, India, para. 35.

The rules in question purport to regulate the conditions upon which land in cantonments was granted prior to the introduction of the Cantonment Code in the year 1899. It is declared that the conditions are to be subscribed to by every grantee of cantonment land as well as by every person to whom the grant may be subsequently transferred. The particular condition with which we are here concerned is laid down in the following terms:—

"If the ground has been built upon, the buildings are not to be disposed of to any person who does not belong to the army until the consent of the officer commanding the station has been previously obtained under his hand."

It is upon this condition that the plaintiff rests his case. No previous sanction to the transfer now in question having been obtained from the authority mentioned in the condition it is claimed that the plaintiff (and under him the military authorities) has the right to ignore the transfer.

The first and second defendants resisted the suit on the same grounds. It was denied that the house had ever been sold to the defendants or their predecessors subject to the condition just mentioned, and it was claimed in substance that the house was held and had been held free of any of the conditions imposed by the Army Regulations cited in the plaint.

It was pleaded that these Regulations had not the force of law and could not be resorted to in order to affect the right of transfer as laid down in the Transfer of Property Act. It was also pleaded that there was no cause of action for the suit; that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain a suit for declaration; and in any case that the declaration should not be granted on the ground that the military authorities in withholding sanction had acted in an unjust, illegal and arbitrary manner.

The Subordinate Judge has found in favour of the plaintiff. He was of opinion that the suit was maintainable, that the plaintiff had a cause of action, that the relations of the parties were governed by the Army Regulations quoted in the plaint, that the first defendant was bound by the condition requiring previous consent to the transfer and that such consent not having been obtained the plaintiff was not obliged to recognize the transfer and to treat the defenant Singlehurst as the owner of the house for the purposes of the Cantonment (House Accommodation) Act, 1902. In the result the Court below gave the plaintiff a decree declaring that the sale-deed in dispute was not binding and is ineffectual as against the military authorities of the Cantonment.

The memorandum of appeal submitted to this Court embodies the various pleas which were raised by way of defence in the Court below. The purely technical pleas have not been strongly pressed before us, nor indeed could they have been.

It being admitted that the land on which the house in dispute has been erected is the property of the plaintiff it could scarcely be contended that the plaintiff has not such an interest in the property in dispute as would entitle him to maintain a suit for declaration under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act.

And clearly if the relations between the parties are governed by the Army Regulations the plaintiff had a cause of action, for it is plain that the transfer to the second defendant was made in spite of an express refusal of the military authorities to accord sanction to the sale. Mr. O'Conor has argued the case on the merits and has contended that the military authorities have no right to withhold sanction, that the Regulations upon which the plaintiff relies have not the force of law and cannot interfere with the right to transfer the house, that the grant of the land was not made subject to the conditions contained in these Regulations and that the want of sanction cannot invalidate the sale or justify the plaintiff in ignoring it so as to deprive the purchaser, Singlehurst of the protection afforded by section 11, clause (c) of the Cantonments (House Accommodation) Act, 1902.

In the course of the arguments we have been referred to the history of the site of the bungalow in dispute and it will be as well here to set out the relevant facts in this connection. There was produced in the Court below a set of the registers relating to the transfer of houses in the Meerut Cantonment and these books have been inspected by us during the hearing of the appeal.

The earliest entry we can find is contained in a register which, so far as we can ascertain, must have been prepared for the first time soon after the year 1833.

On the 16th September, 1833, a General Order was issued by the Commander-in-Chief directing that a register should be kept in the office of the principal staff officer in certain cantonments, including Meerut, for the purpose of recording all transfers of houses, bungalows or gardens in cantonments. It was ordered that all proprietors of houses, etc., should forward to the Staff Officer concerned a memorandum stating when they purchased or became proprietors of the houses from whom they obtained them and the dimensions of their different compounds. It was further directed that all future transfers of houses should be entered in the register (see the compilation of orders printed in the Gazette of India of the 5th November, 1898, Part V, page 371).

There can be little doubt that the first volume of the registers produced before us must have been prepared in accordance with these instructions. We find, then, that the first entry relating to the site of the house now in question shows that a house on this plot was in the occupation of a gentleman named McGarison who was a Civil Surgeon.

On the 18th December, 1844, we find it stated that the house on this site was transferred by one Charles Modden, Civil Surgeon to Major Matthew Smith of H.M.'s 9th Fowt.

On the 29th July, 1852, this officer transferred the house to Lt.-General Sir Joseph Thackwell, G.C.B.

From this date till the 7th February, 1874, the house seems to have remained the property of the Thackwell family.

On this latter date according to an entry in another volume of the register, the house which was then in ruins was sold by the Cantonment Magistrate at public auction and was purchased by one E. C. Roberts, a person who did not belong to the army.

Roberts on the 20th November, 1895, sold the house to a Mrs. Stevenson who on the 2nd July, 1901, made a gift of it in favour of a minor named D. M. Bower.

On the 21st March, 1912, G. T. Bower, the certificated guardian of the minor owner sold the house to Raghubar Dayal, the first defendant in the present suit, and for the purposes of this case it is important to notice what took place on this occasion.

The Cantonment Magistrate having been informed of this proposed transfer wrote both to the guardian and to Raghubar Dayal pointing out that in accordance with Army Regulations bungalows in Cantonments could not be sold without first obtaining the sanction of the Officer Commanding the Station. Both parties were further informed that the land being the property of Government could not be sold and that no sanction would be given to the transfer unless a declaration was made in writing that the land was not being sold and that all that was being transferred was the bungalow together with the out-houses (see the correspondence at page 34 of the printed record).

Bower, the guardian, replied to the Cantonment Magistrate by letter (Ex. 4), dated the 29th March, 1912, that he "noted" that the bungalow could not be sold without the sanction of the Officer Commanding. He further stated that both he and the purchaser (Raghubar Dayal) were aware that the land was the property of Government and could not be sold (see page 35 of the printed record).

After this correspondence the Cantonment Magistrate obtained the sanction of the Officer Commanding at Meerut and this fact was notified to Bower by letter (Ex. 6) dated the 23rd April, 1912.

It is clearly established therefore that when Raghubar Dayal acquired this house in the year 1912 he was made aware of the fact that the military authorities were applying the rules laid down in the Army Regulations and were insisting that the conditions contained in the Regulations governed the transfer of the property and in the circumstances it did not lie in the mouth of Raghubar Dayal to plead as he did plead in para 12 of his written statement that "the bungalow in dispute was never sold to any predecessor of the defendants or to himself, subject to the condition stated in clause (c) of rule 35, Army Regulations, India, Vol. II."

That was without doubt a false plea. Raghubar Dayal was well aware that the sale to him had been made subject to the condition in clause (c).

That falsity of this statement is further demonstrated by the fact that on the 29th July, 1919, when he was arranging to sell this house to Singlehurst he made an application to the Cantonment Magistrate asking him to obtain the sanction of the Officer Commanding the Station to the sale of the house and praying that the sale should be registered. He quoted the Army Regulations in this application and obviously knew all about them (see p. 45 of the printed record). He admits this knowledge in a later letter sent by him to the Cantonment Magistrate on the 12th August, 1919.

We may further note that in another letter printed at pages 51 et seq of the record, Raghubar Dayal described himself to the Cantonment Magistrate as a practising Barrister of nearly twenty years standing with considerable knowledge of Cantonment law.

Whatever be the legal consequences of the notice given to Raghubar Dayal when he was purchasing in the year 1912, it is clear on all hands that he knew that he was taking subject to the condition that the exercise of the right to transfer the house he was buying could only be made with the previous sanction of the Officer Commanding the Station.

With regard to the plea that these Army Regulations relied upon by the plaintiff have no statutory authority and have not the force of law we think it is well-founded and we are unable to agree with the Subordinate Judge who took the contrary view. He refers to the Bombay Regulations which were cited before their Lordships of the Privy Council in the well-known Poona case of Kaikhusru Aderji v. Secretary of State (1) and seems to have thought that the Army Regulations with which we are dealing in this case stand on the same footing. But that is not so. The Bombay Regulations in question were statutory enactments made under the powers reserved to the Governor in Council prior to the introduction of the Government of India Act, 1833.

The Army Regulations with which we are here concerned cannot, so far as we can ascertain be traced to any statutory origin.

The various rules and orders to which the collective name of "Army Regulations, India," was subsequently given were all collated and set out in an appendix to the Cantonments (House Accommodation) Bill which was introduced in the Council of the Governor-General in India for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations on the 4th November, 1898.

The appendix is to be found in the Gazette of India of the 5th November, 1898 at pages 366 et seq.

These orders which issued from time to time between the years 1789 and 1887 are all set out here and are described in various ways, e.g., General Orders, Extracts from proceedings of the Governor-General in Council, General Orders by the Commander-in-Chief, Resolutions of the Military Board, etc. They cannot in our opinion be treated as rules having the force of law; they appear rather to be departmental rules issued with a view to the regulation of administrative business in the Army Department.

The particular rules which we have to consider in this case, i.e., the rules regulating the occupation of land and the disposal of premises and buildings were first promulgated by a General Order of the Governor-General in Council, No. 179, dated the 12th September, 1836, and these rules were re-published from time to time with amendments and variations till they assumed their present shape in Army Regulations, India, 1887, section 17 (see page 394 of the Gazette of India, Part V of the 5th November, 1898).

The General Order of 1836 imposed practically the same restrictions upon the transfer of houses in cantonments as those which are set up by the plaintiff in the present case. It was expressly laid down that where cantonment land had been built upon, the buildings could not be disposed of to any person not belonging to the army until the consent of the Officer Commanding the Station had been previously obtained under his hand.

Now while it might be conceded that this rule, having no force as law could not operate as per se to invalidate a transfer which is good under the ordinary law, it may nevertheless be that a person who has taken a grant of cantonment land subject to this rule may be bound by it. It is true that in the present case we have no evidence of the terms in which the grant of the land upon which the bungalow in dispute now stands was first made. No document of grant is forthcoming nor indeed do we know when the grant was made. There is, however, little doubt that a house had been erected on the land by the year 1833 and before the promulgation of the General Order of 1836.

Up till the year 1874 when the house was transferred to a civilian named Roberts the house and the site had remained in occupation of persons who actually belonged or were deemed to belong to the army.

Since the date of the transfer to Roberts the house changed hands several times, the transferee in each instance being a person not belonging to the army, and it is a fact that each of these transfers down to the transfer in favour of Raghubar Dayal in 1912 has been recorded in the register of transfers maintained by the Cantonment Magistrate. We cannot imagine that any of these transfers could have been made without the previous sanction of the Officer Commanding the Station. It must be presumed that the Cantonment Magistrate in each case acted in accordance with the Army Regulations which were certainly binding upon him as a military officer and we have direct evidence in the case of the transfer to Raghubar Dayal that the previous sanction of the Officer Commanding the Station was sought and obtained before the transfer was registered. We have already pointed out that the conditions governing the transfer of the house were brought to Raghubar Dayal's notice and accepted by him. We have referred, moreover, to the fact that Raghubar Dayal sought previous sanction when he was about to transfer to the defendant Singlehurst.

While there is therefore no available evidence to show what conditions were attached to the grant of the site of the house when it was first built, there is in our opinion ample evidence to show that Raghubar Dayal took the house in 1912 subject to the limitation imposed by the rule upon the right of transfer and we hold that in the circumstances he is bound by the condition.

In the Poona case referred to above (36 Bom. 1) it was held that the appellants and their predecessors-in-title held merely upon cantonment tenure and had no status therefore other than that of licensees. That, in our opinion, is the status of Raghubar Dayal and of his successors-in-interest since his death. It is not claimed here, as it was in the Poona case, that the land is not the property of Government. On the contrary it is admitted freely that the land does belong to the Government. Raghubar Dayal and his predecessors held no lease, it is not pretended that they did, and that being so they could not be more than licensees, and therefore bound by the conditions of the license. Each transfer as it was made and sanctioned amounted to nothing more than the transfer of a license. That was the view taken by Russell, J., in the judgment of the Bombay High Court, and we understand that view to have been accepted by their Lordships of the Privy Council.

At page 9 of the report, dealing with the meaning of the word "sanctioned" endorsed upon the document of transfer in favour of the predecessor-in title of the appellants he observed as follows:—

"What is the meaning of the word 'sanctioned' in Ex. 71? The only meaning I have been able to attribute to that word upon Ex. 71 is that in accordance with the Rules and Regulations then prevailing upon the subject, the Brigadier-General permitted and ratified the surrender by Beyts, and the admittance of Dorabji Pastonji. I cannot believe that it was intended to refer merely to the transfer of one name in place of another in the register, for otherwise the register would be a purely useless and unnecessary document. By the use of the word 'sanctioned' I take it what the Brigadier-General meant was that inasmuch as Mr. Beyts had surrendered all his rights to this cantonment property the Brigadier-General was willing to substitute Dorabji Pastonji for him under the then prevailing orders and regulations under which, as we know, it was entirely ultra vires for the Brigadier-General to allow or to connive at allowing the vendee of those rights to acquire any proprietary rights whatever in the land itself."
